Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we are losing a lot of time here trying to proceed with business, when there is a certain determination on the part of certain Members to object to all these bills, and I move that we adjourn.

Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the motion. If we can go ahead and transact business, I am willing to stay here; but if we are going to have a lot of horseplay, I am not in favor of staying here.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Speaker, it is an important message that I want to convey to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman mind stating upon what subject he desires to address the House?

Mr. GAMBRILL. I have been in poor health for a year, and am forced to conserve my strength in every way possible, but I understand there is a movement on foot tonight to object to every bill sponsored by any Member who has not signed the McLeod petition. If this condition is to prevail, then the Congress of the United States should adjourn until its Members can transact business in an orderly manner, free from prejudice.

Mr. BLANTON. I think so myself; if there is any such movement on foot here in this Chamber, it would be a ridiculous situation, and we ought to adjourn.

Mr. LAMNECK. There is, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Then we might just as well adjourn, Mr. Speaker. It is ridiculous for a group of men to enter into an agreement like that. There are some good bills on this calendar that ought to have fair consideration tonight.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we are passing bills here appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars without anybody knowing just what they are.

Mr. BLANTON. Some of us know all about these bills. The gentleman can stop any of them by one objection.

Mr. TRUAX. I have stopped them. The gentleman from Texas can stop them as well as I.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not stop the good ones, but I do try to stop the bad ones.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who signed the McLeod bill. Whether I shall vote for it or not is another question, and I will not unless it includes relief to depositors in saving-and-loan and building-and-loan associations, although I seriously question the principle involved; but if these obstructive tactics are to prevail I shall withdraw my name from the petition. These private bills should be considered on their separate merits.

Mr. TRUAX. That is the gentleman's privilege. I shall not withdraw my name, nor shall I withdraw my name from the Frazier petition.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 8482) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, consider, and render judgment on certain claims of George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd?

Mr. BROWNING rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized to make a statement.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Michigan intend to object if we press for consideration of this bill this evening?

Mr. LEHR. Yes; I intend to object.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman object to the bill going over without prejudice?

Mr. LEHR. I want to object, and I understand there are two others who want to object.

Mr. BROWNING. Only one objection is required.

Mr. LEHR. I understand that.

Mr. DUFFEY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BROWNING. Is the gentleman from Michigan willing to let the bill go over without prejudice?

Mr. LEHR. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

W. R. M'LEOD

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, in order to test the temper of the House, I ask unanimous consent to return to a very, very small bill which was objected to, Private Calendar No. 454, H.R. 5606, for the relief of W. R. McLeod, and ask for its present consideration. This is a bill which involves $200.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington to return to Calendar No. 454?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the McLeod bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. This is a bill for the relief of a man by the name of McLeod, Mr. Speaker; but it is not the McLEOD of Michigan fame.

I have an amendment reducing the amount from $374.02 to $200.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $374.02, and when appropriated the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay same to W. R. McLeod, postmaster at Apopka, Fla., to reimburse him in the amount of postal funds stolen from the post office by burglars.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "burglars", insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: Page 1, line 5, strike out "$374.02" and insert in lieu thereof "$200."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition on the amendment and ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, it is evident tonight that some of us, and I am one of them, who signed the McLeod petition are somewhat disappointed at the tactics that have been used in trying to restrict the number of legislative days, but I want to say, in all fairness, that there are bills on this Private Calendar which involve the payment of money to widows, children, and other people. There are many parliamentary ways in which this House can take action on this bill or other petitions, even if some of us do not approve of certain things that have gone on on account of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KVALE. Does not the gentleman agree that the individuals involved in these private measures think that those bills for the moment are the most important thing in the world?

Mr. GOSS. I think that is true. Many of them cannot in any way secure relief except to come to this floor and ask it of the Congress. It is perfectly evident that this House can adjourn in 2 minutes if it wants to, but I want to appeal to the Members of the House, out of fairness to these people who cannot get relief in any other way, to please be reasonable and let us go on with the Private Calendar. I do not refer to the real conscientious objections which are made to bills, such as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] makes, but I am trying to appeal to the Members to go on and let us consider these things on their merits, and then we will work out the parliamentary situation. The minority is always protected in this House, if it uses the proper parliamentary procedure. It will not gain us anything to adjourn and then come in here at a later date.

I realize fully what has been done, and I appeal to the Members of the House as one of the signers, not threatening and not willing to take my name off the petition for anything that happens here tonight, to go on and pass these bills that are not objected to.

When the resolution comes in for the House to adjourn, at any time a majority of the House may vote it down; then you will be doing what you want to do for the McLeod bill or any other petition.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that most of the business of this House is conducted by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is speaking out of order now by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOSS. I am.

Mr. BLANTON. That was because we permitted him to do so; yet the gentleman criticizes something which at noon was done here by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOSS. I am not criticizing anything.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman criticized the action taken here today in adjourning over, which was done by unanimous consent, and the gentleman never stopped it.

Mr. GOSS. I was not here. I was in the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. It was the gentleman's duty to be here if he wanted to stop a unanimous-consent request. The gentleman is in the minority and he is not responsible for carrying on the administration's program. It is the majority here that is responsible for that.

Mr. GOSS. I am trying to appeal to the majority.

Mr. BLANTON. We are following our able majority leader, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and we are behind him and supporting him.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GOSS. I want the Members to consider these bills this evening.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, a parlimentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. Today shortly after 12 o'clock the majority leader asked unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Thursday of this week, and that when the House adjourns on Thursday it adjourn to meet on Monday of next week. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Is it now in order to move to reconsider the vote by which that unanimous-consent request was secured?

Mr. BLANTON. Why, no; that can be done only by unanimous consent, and that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am not asking the gentleman from Texas for his opinion.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I am answering the gentleman.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am not asking the gentleman from Texas to answer the parliamentary inquiry for me.

Mr. BLANTON. The rules of the House do not permit that.

Mr. BOILEAU. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas sit down for awhile.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is that the gentleman is propounding a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether it is now in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn from tonight until Thursday and from Thursday until Monday?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I think a motion to reconsider is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the motion to reconsider might be in order on the same day or the succeeding day, if it were not for the fact that by unanimous consent special arrangements were made for the consideration of the Private Calendar on this particular occasion. Inasmuch as the House met this evening solely for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar the Chair does not believe it would be in order to reconsider that vote at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. That could be done only by unanimous consent anyway. No such motion would be in order. You cannot change the rules of the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard further on the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman further on the point of order.

Mr. BOILEAU. I desire to present this matter for the Speaker's consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that we have not a quorum. We are not going to waste the time of the House on any ridiculous parliamentary questions of this kind that are so patent to everybody, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman from Tennessee made a statement in the well of the House which no Member of the House could hear, just as he did at noon when this unanimous consent was granted.

Mr. BYRNS. I resent that.

Mr. BOILEAU. You can resent it if you desire to.

Mr. BYRNS. I turned around at the time, and the gentleman was sitting in front of the gentleman from Minnesota; and I stated my request; and the gentleman is not telling the truth when he says I stated it in that way. [Applause.]

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman was standing right where he is now.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, has the Chair ruled that a quorum is not present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated that a quorum is not present.

Mr. BYRNS. Then undoubtedly we will have to adjourn or have a call of the House, and I am not willing to ask Members to come from their homes at quarter past 8, and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 65, noes 20.

So the motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.) the House, in accordance with its previous order, adjourned to meet on Thursday, May 17, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

4660. Also, petition of Richard L. G. Deverall, 203 Walnut Street, Ridgewood, N.J., and various members of the Ridgewood Catholic Study Group, endorsing a proposed amendment to section 301 of Senate bill 2910 in opposition to radio discrimination; to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MAY 16, 1934

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 10, 1934)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day, Tuesday, May 15, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that Mr. OLIVER of New York was appointed an additional manager on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The message also announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 258) for the relief of Wallace E. Ordway.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 3726. An act to grant a patent to Albert M. Johnson and Walter Scott;

H.R. 5122. An act for the relief of William S. Steward;

H.R. 6803. An act to regulate the distribution, promotion, retirement, and discharge of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes;

H.R. 9068. An act to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 9092. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to lend to the housing committee of the United Confederate Veterans 250 pyramidal tents, complete; fifteen 16- by 80- by 40-foot assembly tents; thirty 11- by 50- by 15-foot hospital-ward tents; 10,000 blankets, olive drab, no. 4; 5,000 canvas cots; 20 field ranges, no. 1; 10 field bake ovens, to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans, to be held at Chattanooga, Tenn., in June 1934.

PRESERVATION OF PRESENT SUPREME COURT CHAMBER—PETITION

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the New York County (N.Y.) Lawyers' Association, favoring the adoption of Senate Resolution No. 193 (submitted by Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas), authorizing that the room now occupied by the United States Supreme Court be preserved and kept open to the public, which was ordered to lie on the table.

RELIEF OF MINERS IN ARIZONA

Mr. ASHURST presented the following communication in the nature of a petition, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIAMI, ARIZ., May 7, 1934.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: In response to a growing feeling of dissatisfaction and indignation that has been developing throughout this State for months, and with the hope that the unfair methods of conducting the operations of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration in this State, may be corrected, so that the starving thousands throughout the State depending solely upon Public Welfare for their subsistence may be adequately provided for, we are making a last appeal to you as one of our representatives in the Congress to aid us in remedying this deplorable situation.

There are hereto attached several memoranda depicting our correspondence with the various agencies, State, regional, and national, who are responsible for our well-being. To you, as Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, we are submitting the evidence as to whether or not this is a last appeal. In glancing through our correspondence with the various agencies you will note that we have been repeatedly sidetracked by them all. We have been denied the right of every free-born American to a fair and just hearing of our case. The charges which we sent to the Honorable Harry L. Hopkins, which we are sending on to you, were referred by Mr. Hopkins back to our State Welfare Board. We now have the extraordinary situation of the accused passing upon his own convicting evidence.

Throughout all our correspondence we believe that our demands have been fair and just. At no time have we threatened mob violence, but have scrupulously conformed to the spirit of N.R.A. in attempting to bargain collectively through representatives of our choosing with the personages who have our livelihood in their hands. This they have repeatedly failed to do as you can readily see from the correspondence. We have no quarrel with any of these men as individuals or with the industrial concerns they represent, but we maintain that it is unfair to those men and to us to have them pass judgment on what amount is necessary to keep a human being alive when they are fully aware that their corporations and their own personal incomes may eventually bear the cost of this depression through higher taxation.

Under the present set-up of the E.R.A. in Arizona, a single man is allowed $7.50 a month; a married man with no children is given $17.50 a month; a married man with one child, $21 a month; two children, $21 a month; three children, $21 a month in cash and a supplementary grocery order of $2. Twenty-one dollars in cash is the limit given any one family, but the amount of supplementary groceries ranges from $2 to $9, according to the number of dependents over three. Formerly they allowed us to purchase our groceries through a commissary under which we were able to purchase from 20 to 25 percent more foodstuffs than if we had purchased them from private concerns. Now we are no longer able to do so, but must go to private concerns to do our buying, where we are also compelled to pay the sales tax on all our purchases. In order to get this meager allotment, we are compelled to work on highways several miles away from the community, with the resulting wear and tear on shoes and clothing and with the maximum income set at $21 a month cash, how are the workers going to replace their wearing apparel? We are opposed to the dole, but we do demand an adequate standard of living which we certainly are not getting now.

We appeal to you, Senator ASHURST, to demand that the existing conditions set forth in this letter be rectified immediately, and we further request after careful deliberation that you place the following resolution before the Congress of the United States, and petition that said resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States has seen fit to deny Senator HENRY F. ASHURST'S plea for an adequate copper tariff to protect the starving copper miners of this country and their destitute families, thereby denying them the right to make their own independent living: Be it

Resolved, That we demand of Congress that they enact legislation giving the starving miners and their families a living with some semblance of decent American standards.

Very truly yours,

F. A. CULBERTSON,
President.
FLOYD F. McBRIDE,
Secretary.

By Mr. DUFFY:

A bill (S. 3628) to amend section 114 of the Judicial Code to provide for terms of District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin to be held at Wausau, Wis., and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NYE:

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 122) directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate and report to Congress facts relating to manufacture, sale, or distribution of agricultural implements and machinery; ordered to lie on the table.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. TYDINGS, the Committee on Banking and Currency was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3530) relating to Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States, and it was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I ask that the Committee on Military Affairs may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 7982) to establish a national military park at the battlefield of Monocacy, Md., and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. An identical Senate bill was previously so referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H.R. 3726. An act to grant a patent to Albert M. Johnson and Walter Scott; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

H.R. 9092. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to lend to the housing committee of the United Confederate Veterans 250 pyramidal tents, complete; fifteen 16- by 80- by 40-foot assembly tents; thirty 11- by 50- by 15-foot hospital-ward tents; 10,000 blankets, olive drab, no. 4; 5,000 canvas cots; 20 field ranges, no. 1; 10 field bake ovens, to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans, to be held at Chattanooga, Tenn., in June 1934; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H.R. 4670. An act for the relief of Lyman D. Drake, Jr.; and

H.R. 5122. An act for the relief of William S. Steward; to the Committee on Claims.

H.R. 6803. An act to regulate the distribution, promotion, retirement, and discharge of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 9068. An act to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS—AMENDMENT

Mr. HEBERT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT PERTAINING TO PERMANENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HAYDEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 9410) providing that permanent appropriations be subject to annual consideration and appropriation by Congress, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

Mr. O'MAHONEY submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 29) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the popular election of President and Vice President of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC IN FOOD AND DRUGS—AMENDMENT

Mr. STEPHENS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2800) to prevent the manufacture, shipment, and sale of adulterated or misbranded food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics, and to regulate traffic therein; to prevent the false advertisement of food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics; and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION REPORTS TO N.R.A.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S.Res. 240) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed, under the authority of "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission", to send to the Senate copies of correspondence with and reports made to the National Industrial Recovery Administration by the Federal Trade Commission in response to requests made for such reports.

GRAVELLY POINT AIRPORT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Washington Post of May 11, 1934, with respect to the Gravelly Point airport in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of May 11, 1934]

DELAY ON THE AIRPORT

Emphatic reendorsement of Gravelly Point as a site for Washington's permanent airport seems to have been the chief result of a conference between civic leaders and Department of Commerce officials on Wednesday. A resolution adopted after a protracted discussion calls for immediate hearings on the Gibson bill, which would authorize development of the Gravelly Point site. In view of this strong backing that measure appears to offer the most practical approach to the problem.

A committee of Senators was named several weeks ago to study the Gibson bill. Apparently it has remained inactive only because its members are busy with other legislative matters. In the meantime, however, the need for a modern airport here has become more critical. Two additional airlines will soon begin using Washington Airport, which is notoriously inadequate and hazardous. The local airport problem thus takes on the nature of an emergency.

While the Gibson bill is principally concerned with the construction of a permanent airport at Gravelly Point, it would also authorize improvement of the air terminal now in use. Military Road, which cuts through Washington Airport, menacing motorists as well as airplane passengers, could be removed and temporary extension of the field would be possible. In this way the worst hazards of flying in Washington might be removed while a permanent airport is being constructed.

Since the airport situation here has been extensively studied and an increasing majority of the bodies interested in the orderly development of the Capital City is leaning toward the Gravelly Point site, there seems to be no justification for further delay in Congress. The very fact that several years may be required to build the contemplated terminal makes action during the present session more urgent.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND RELIEF

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, recently, by request of the joint committee on unemployment, an informal hearing was held on unemployment and relief in the Senate Office Building in this city at which social-welfare experts were invited to submit the latest data available on this vital subject. The meeting was approved or attended by the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and New York [Mr. WAGNER], together with Representative CONNERY, of Massachusetts, Chairman of the House Committee on Labor, Representative LUNDEEN, of Wisconsin, and myself. It would appear desirable—and I ask unanimous consent—to preserve in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the summary of the testimony presented on that occasion.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the hearing on unemployment and relief held at Washington, D.C., April 21, 1934, at the request of the joint committee on unemployment, testimony was presented, in part, as follows:

Harry L. Lurie, director the Jewish Bureau for Social Research of New York:

"The standard of living of millions of unemployed in the United States and their dependents has been drastically reduced. The purchasing power of the unemployed which was derived from Federal aid through relief or work—and for a large proportion of the unemployed this relief constituted the sole income—was reduced between January and April of this year by approximately 70 percent.

"The number receiving relief derived from Federal funds is increasing according to recent reports. In November 1933, previous to the Civil Works program, 3,357,000 families were on relief; in April 1934 relief families totaled 4,700,000."

Dr. Sidney E. Goldstein, of New York, chairman executive committee, joint committee on unemployment:

"In New York City there are at least 1,000,000 men and women out of work whole time, and in the State of New York about 1,750,000.

"The number of families still destitute and dependent in New York City is about 300,000, and in the State about 500,000. The standard of assistance in both relief and work relief in New York State, while higher than last year, is still too low to maintain families upon a decent level of life. The average allowance is about $40 per month, which is not sufficient for rent, nourishing food, proper clothing, and other items, such as light, heat, and medical care."

Miss Rose M. Stein, secretary the League for Social Justice, of Pittsburgh:

"There are at present 1,000,000 unemployed in Pennsylvania, or 1 out of every 4 normally employed. Close to one half of these are on relief rolls.

"There are 450,000 relief cases embracing 1,400,000 persons. Relief grants average about $5.30 a month per person. The State provides no shelter. That is, no rents are paid. Where a person is faced with actual eviction, a month's rent is paid out of private welfare funds. This is paid in a new location and the client starts all over again the system of avoiding the constable or sheriff.

"This rate of relief is responsible for approximately 50-percent malnutrition among children in industrial communities. Scores of cases are reported of a run-down condition acquired in the course of an inadequate diet provided by relief rations."

Dr. W. G. Bergman, former secretary the mayor's unemployment committee in Detroit:

"Despite Detroit's most prosperous month in 4 years, there are nearly 27,000 families on the rolls of the department of public welfare in Wayne County (Detroit and vicinity), and 16,000 ex-C.W.A. workers who have applied for relief are still awaiting investigation.

"Nowhere else in the State is there evidence of decreased employment. Some 350,000 families are unemployed, and of them 120,000 families are receiving public aid. This load is expected to increase to a maximum of 150,000 in the next 2 months, according to the State emergency relief administrator. This increase is due to the sudden stoppage of the C.W.A. program. The cessation of C.W.A. has caused Michigan's relief budget to drop from $8,500,000 to $4,500,000, most of which comes from the Federal Government. The average monthly budget from the State is now $30, although in some cities food allowances are as low as 8 cents per day per individual. Probably 50,000 individuals are permanently unemployable under the present industrial set-up in Michigan."

Glenford W. Lawrence, Chicago Commons, Chicago, Ill.:

"In the first 2 weeks of April 1934 the increase in case loads in Cook County has been 13,000, or 24 percent, and the only reason it has not been larger is because the intake department could not interview any more clients, is the testimony of the head of the Unemployment Relief Service, Cook County (Chicago).

"Nonfamily men, to the number of 18,000 to 20,000, are being cared for at an expense of 14⅛ cents per day, while the statistician for the Illinois Emergency Relief Commission states that the April needs were $2,000,000 over his estimate for this month. The administrator of the Illinois Relief Commission estimates there are 700,000 unemployed men in Chicago and about 1,250,000 in the State. The average relief per family was $22.43 for the whole State during February, and $32.40 in Cook County. Some counties had spent less than $4 on relief, while some counties spent $10. Comparing these figures with the C.W.A. salaries, we find that the average for the State during the high point of C.W.A. was $18.88 per week as against $5.77 average for relief. For Cook County the average of C.W.A. workers was $21.20 per week, while the relief average was only $7.85."

John Davis, executive secretary the joint committee on national recovery, comprising 22 national organizations interested in the place of the Negro in the recovery program:

"In 1930, there were five and one half million Negro citizens gainfully employed, representing 11.3 percent of the total working population. Of this number, about 2,000,000 were engaged in agriculture, another million in industries or trades which come under the jurisdiction of the National Recovery Administration, and about one and one half million were employed as personal servants and household employees. Out of every 200 workers in the country, 23 are Negro; and of these 23, 9 are agricultural workers, 6 industrial, 6 domestic, and the other 2 teachers, ministers, doctors, lawyers, or other professionals. Although Negro families were only 9.4 percent of all families in the country in 1930, 18.4 percent of all families listed on relief rolls in October 1933, were Negro, the total number being 575,923. In countless rural areas of the South the issuance of relief to Negroes is unheard of. In southern industrial centers, the Negro family is not eligible to relief if any member of the family is working.

"In addition to utterly destitute families in October, there were hundreds of thousands of other Negro families whose income per family does not exceed $5 a week."

Mr. Davis stated that Negro farmers are discriminated against in getting loans, and the Negro share-croppers in most cases never saw the checks due them, since these checks were made payable to the landowners, who retained them. He added, "Because landowners no longer need large numbers of farm hands, they are cruelly ordering them off the plantation, although under the contract they agreed not to reduce the number of their tenants."

Howard Kester, of Nashville, Tenn., sent the following statement:

"Unemployment conditions are so bad that apparently publicity is being suppressed. Through private, but responsible channels, I have secured some information of importance. The liquidation of the C.W.A. has immeasurably intensified suffering of a large part of the population of the State, and relief rolls have greatly swollen. In Memphis and Shelby County those on relief rose from 6,000 families in February, to 12,000 families in March, not including 500 transient families and 3,000 single men, all together approximating one sixth of the population. Chattanooga and Hamilton County reports rise from 3,048 in February, to 6,000 families in March, totaling 26,707 persons. Knoxville and Knox County, 8,361 families on direct relief in March.

"Nashville has nearly three times as many on relief in March 1934, as a year ago. Other cities and counties report corresponding conditions. F.E.R.A. reports indicate there are more than 30,000 families on relief in the counties where the four largest cities are located. Farmers are in desperate circumstances. While the cost of living has advanced, their farm products have decreased in value. One rural county reports 60 percent of population on relief now. Violation of code wages, share-the-work, share-the-pay envelop movement, increase in the cost of living, disbanding of C.W.A., are slowly bringing chaos and hopelessness. Knoxville, Nashville, and Memphis case workers report numerous instances of families living from garbage cans. The situation is desperate. F.E.R.A. absolutely inadequate. I regret my own inability to be present, but sincerely hope you can get the Federal Government to greatly enlarge its program of relief."

FEDERAL REVENUES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the New York Times of May 16, 1934, relating to the subject of Federal revenues. The editorial is brief, but it contains information of interest to Senators. It discloses that there has been a large increase in revenues during the present fiscal year as compared with the same period of the last fiscal year.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of May 16, 1934]

FEDERAL REVENUES

One of the encouraging signs of the times is the steady gain in Federal revenues. Treasury receipts thus far in the current fiscal year amount to $2,622,000,000, compared with $1,716,000,000 in the same period a year ago and with $1,692,000,000 in 1931–32. This year's account, to be sure, is padded by the inclusion of one extraneous item: About $300,000,000 derived from taxes imposed on the processing of wheat, cotton, tobacco, etc., under the various crop-curtailment programs of the A.A.A. This is not properly a Government revenue, since it is earmarked for distribution to farmers, and the Treasury collects it for that purpose. But even after this sum is deducted from gross receipts, the Government's income is 35 percent above the figure for last year and nearly 40 percent in excess of that for 1931–32.

With one exception all of the main divisions of the Treasury's revenue show a gain. The exception is the "miscellaneous" group, which includes as its principal item payments on the war debts. The amount received this year from foreign governments is only $20,000,000, compared with nearly $100,000,000 last year and with more than $200,000,000 in the year before the Hoover moratorium. But the falling off of revenue from this source has not upset the administration's plans. In the Budget estimates submitted to Congress in January the Treasury estimated $20,000,000 as the amount which would be paid, adding in a footnote that if more was received, so much the better.

All the other and more important revenues show improvement. Customs receipts have increased from $215,000,000 last year to $279,000,000, reflecting the greater activity in foreign trade. The yield of income taxes has advanced from $589,000,000 to $613,000,000. But by far the greatest gain has been made in the case of internal-revenue taxes, which, bringing in $1,280,000,000 this year compared with $705,000,000 a year ago, have increased their yield by no less than 80 percent. This is the first time since 1922, and only the fourth time in the history of the country, that receipts from internal-revenue taxes have passed the billion-dollar mark. The highly favorable showing is due partly to the new liquor taxes and partly to the greater yield of those imposed on the sale of motor cars and other industrial products.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 29) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the popular election of President and Vice President of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 29) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the popular election of President and Vice President of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire the joint resolution read?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution be read.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Let the joint resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the joint resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as proposed to be amended by the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the States, to wit:

"The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows: The choice of each State for President and Vice President shall be determined at a general election of the qualified electors of such State. The time of such election shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different time such election shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of the President and Vice President. The electors in each State shall vote directly for President and Vice President, and the laws of such State which apply to the canvassing of votes for chief executive of the State shall apply to the votes cast for President and Vice President. The laws of the State providing for the placing of the names of candidates for the office of chief executive of such State, including the names of independent candidates, upon the official ballot, if any is provided by the laws of the State, shall apply to the names of candidates, including independent candidates, for the office of President and Vice President. Each State shall be entitled to as many votes for President and Vice President as the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State is entitled in Congress. Each State shall certify and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate, the result of said election. Such certificate shall contain distinct lists of all persons for whom votes were cast for President and for Vice President, the number of votes for each, and the total votes of the State cast for all candidates for President and for all candidates for Vice President. The President of the Senate shall, at a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes cast for President in any State shall be credited with all the Presidential votes for President to which said State is entitled. The person having the greatest number of Presidential votes for President shall be the President, if such number is 35 percent or more of the total Presidential votes cast for President. The foregoing provisions shall apply to the election of Vice President, but no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President.

SEC. 2. If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of votes cast for President, or if no person shall have received 35 percent of the total Presidential votes, then from the persons having the highest numbers of Presidential votes not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President the House of Representatives shall choose immediately by ballot the President. If said list of three cannot be ascertained because of two or more persons having received an equal number of votes, then said list shall be increased accordingly. In choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having 1 vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a majority of such quorum shall be necessary to a choice.

If two or more persons shall have an equal and the highest number of votes cast for Vice President, or if no person shall have received 35 percent of the total votes cast for Vice President, then from the persons having the highest numbers of votes cast for Vice President not exceeding two on the list of those voted for as Vice President, the Senate shall choose the Vice President. If said list of two cannot be ascertained because of two or more persons having received an equal number of votes, then said list shall be increased accordingly.

SEC. 3. Congress may by law provide what procedure shall be followed and the method of obtaining a decision in case there shall be more than one certificate of Presidential votes from any State, or in case of any other dispute or controversy that may arise in the counting and the canvassing of the Presidential votes by said joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives.

SEC. 4. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II of the Constitution, and the twelfth amendment to the Constitution are hereby repealed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the effect of this proposed constitutional amendment, if it shall be adopted as proposed to be amended by the Judiciary Committee, will be to provide for direct voting in all the States for President and Vice President. The amendment provides that the names of candidates for President and Vice President shall be placed on the official ballot, if the State provides for one, just as the names of candidates for chief executive of the State shall be placed upon the official ballot. The amendment provides for the certification of the vote in the same way that the vote is now certified, excepting that the officials of the State certify the vote directly for President instead of for electors. The counting is done in the same way. In other words, the attempt is to change the existing Constitution as little as possible.

I have heard statements and have read articles in newspapers to the effect that this amendment is intended to give a political advantage to some political party. I have heard the charge made that it is a Republican measure, and I have heard the charge made that it is a Democratic measure. The truth is that there is absolutely no politics in the amendment. There is no advantage to either party.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; but I was called out of the Chamber while the proposed amendment was being read and did not follow it closely.

The electors are eliminated, of course, and the vote is tabulated by States.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will each State then have the present number of votes? For example, will Maryland have 8 votes?

Mr. NORRIS. If she has 8 votes now, she will have 8 votes then.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, the system we now have will remain, except that the cumbersome machinery of the electors will be eliminated?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to call to the Senator's attention the language near the top of page 3:

> Such certificate shall contain distinct lists of all persons for whom votes were cast for President and for Vice President, the number of votes for each, and the total votes of the State cast for all candidates for President and for all candidates for Vice President. The President of the Senate shall, at a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

The point to which I wish to direct the Senator's attention pertains to the mechanics of the provision rather than to its merits. It seems to me that the word "votes" is used in two different senses in this paragraph. In the first place it apparently refers to the ballots of the individual electors in the election. In the second place the term "votes" is used in a different sense.

I am wondering if the Senator from Nebraska has given thought to that aspect of the matter. Manifestly it is not the intention of the provision to require a counting of the ballots.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. So it occurs to me that the language should be clarified somewhat. I am merely calling the Senator's attention to it so that, if the language is not clear, it may be clarified.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is true that there are two kinds of votes here, and the committee had some difficulty with that phase of the amendment. I think, however, we have reached a conclusion which makes it perfectly plain. There are votes of individual electors at the election, where they vote for candidates for President and Vice President. Then, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] said awhile ago, the State has a certain number of votes. Maryland, for example, has eight votes. Those votes are different from the votes of the individuals who vote at the election. We have undertaken to call the votes of the State Presidential votes. The State has 8 votes, but the number of votes cast in the State may be two or three hundred thousand. They are individual votes.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. The purpose of requiring a certification of the aggregate of the votes cast for the different candidates is merely statistical, and has nothing to do with the counting of the votes by Congress other than that it is the duty of Congress to determine for whom the Presidential votes shall be counted from the results certified in the States, as I understand.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. For instance, in the case of Nebraska there may be five or six candidates for President, but the one receiving the plurality in the State receives all the votes of Nebraska; so when the votes are counted, as referred to by the Senator from Arkansas, the Congress simply determines which of the candidates received the plurality, and then counts the Presidential votes in accordance therewith in determining the result of the Presidential election.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand perfectly the intention of the provision; but the point I am making is that there is an ambiguity in the sense that the word "votes" is used with two different meanings in the same paragraph. I am suggesting that the word "votes" where last used should be qualified in some way so as to make clear that it refers to the votes of the States rather than the votes of the electors.

Mr. NORRIS. I see the point the Senator is making. If it is not clear, and it is desired to make it clearer in the place to which the Senator has called attention, it is very easy to put in the word "Presidential" before the word "votes" in that instance. They are the only kind of votes that the Congress counts. We must distinguish between the votes of the States and the votes of the individuals.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the meaning is clear as it is, although I should welcome anything that would help clarify it.

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. COSTIGAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in reading over this amendment casually, I notice that the votes for President are to be counted, and the votes for Vice President are to be counted.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know what the system is in all States. I suppose it is the same; but I recall that in Maryland at the last election, for example, at the top of the ballot were the names "Roosevelt and Garner" and under them the names "Hoover and Curtis." Would we still be able to put on the ballot the names of the candidates for President and Vice President so that one vote would count for both of them, or would they be in separate columns?

Mr. NORRIS. I should think they would be in separate columns. They would be arranged the same as the names of candidates for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, for instance; but such matters would be arranged by the States.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will yield further, I was about to observe that I am in sympathy with the amendment, but I believe it would be wise to retain the feature of the old system; which gives the voter a chance to vote, for instance, for Roosevelt and Garner, on the one hand, and for Hoover and Curtis, on the other hand. It might so happen at some time, in a close election, that the President would be selected from one party, and the Vice President from the other party. While that would not be a catastrophe——

Mr. NORRIS. According to my political philosophy, it would be a blessing.

Mr. TYDINGS. I feel that the presence of conditions such as existed, for example, at the time of the last Presidential election causes a distinct philosophy to be involved, and the election might be very close.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. And I realize that it might happen that many people would vote only for the head of the ticket, and would not bother about the other candidates, although they might be more or less in sympathy with the philosophy of the party of the candidate for whom the vote was cast. We want the people's desires to be reflected; and therefore I feel that if the names of the candidates of one party for President and Vice President could appear in one block, it would be wiser than to separate them, and have a citizen vote for a Democrat in one case and for a Republican in the other, although such a procedure may have some advantages.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Does not the amendment, as proposed, specifically provide that the manner of placing the names on the ballots shall be determined by the legislature of the particular State?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it does.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In listening to this informal discussion, I have been impressed with the view that the suggestion of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] might be achieved if the last words on line 8, page 3, were to read, in substance, as follows:

> And the total number of Presidential and Vice Presidential votes shall then be tabulated.

Mr. NORRIS. That might be an improvement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that would meet the suggestion made by me.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that the language in the proposed amendment including the word "counted" is the language of the present Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; but, if I may call the Senator's attention to it, in the original Constitution the word "votes" is not used in a different sense in two paragraphs.

Mr. NORRIS. No; that is true.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield again to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. In order to elicit the sentiment of the Senate, will the Senator be so kind, if he can do so readily, as to tell me how I may offer an amendment to his proposal which will make it possible for the voter to vote, say, for Roosevelt and Garner in one block and for Hoover and Curtis in the other, rather than for Roosevelt and Curtis, for example?

Mr. NORRIS. I had not thought of that. I think, perhaps, the Senator will find upon looking through the amendment a suitable place to offer an amendment of that kind. Personally, I should be very much opposed to such an amendment, although I do not think it is really involved in this proposal. I think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] has answered the suggestion fully when he says the States can do as they please about the matter. They can do so at the present time. A State now can provide for a separate vote for President and a separate vote for Vice President, with only one exception—that under the present provision of the Constitution the Vice President and the President cannot both be voted for if they come from the same State.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand from the Senator from Kentucky that the system of placing names on the ballot in Kentucky is different from that in Maryland. In order that I may make my position quite plain, I desire to recount briefly to the Senator how the ballot is constructed in Maryland.

First, there are the names of Roosevelt and Garner. Then there is a block opposite those names. Then under that are the names of the eight electors who are running on that ticket, with a block opposite the name of each.

Then under that there would be, for instance, the names of Hoover and Curtis, and a block opposite those names, and then the names of eight electors underneath them.

Under our system, as the names are placed on the ballot, a man is denied the right to vote for Mr. Roosevelt on the one hand and Mr. Curtis on the other for the respective offices. I concede that he might want to do that and have no choice, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will let me interrupt him there, so far as I know under our present system there is not any State that allows or can allow a man to vote for a candidate on one ticket for President and a candidate on a different ticket for Vice President, because the vote is not cast for the President and the Vice President. It is the elector who is voted for. It would be necessary to get an elector who would announce to the people, "If I am elected, I am going to vote for the Democratic candidate for President and the Republican candidate for Vice President", or vice versa. That would be entirely impractical.

Mr. TYDINGS. I can appreciate that. But, instead of having the voter mark his ballot once for President and once for Vice President, it seemed to me that if he could vote for HALE and FESS, for example, for President and Vice President, the one vote would be sufficient.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to go a little further before I take up suggested amendments, and, in a general way, explain what I think, and especially what the Committee on the Judiciary think, is important in the consideration of the proposed constitutional amendment.

I think practically everyone agrees that the electoral college is like a fifth wheel to a wagon. It is useless, and everybody wants to get rid of it. When we seek to get rid of it, we encounter a great many difficulties; for instance, we have encountered one this morning.

There are those who believe that allowing a State like New York, for instance, with many electors, to cast its vote without giving any credit to any of the minority, is an unfair way of selecting a President. The model way, would be, I concede—and this joint resolution as first introduced so provided—to provide that when a State certifies its vote to Congress, it shall certify the vote for each Presidential candidate, and that in counting the votes we shall give to the State as a whole the number of votes to which it is entitled, but divide the whole number in proportion to the number of votes cast in the selection for the various candidates.

Thus, if a man in New York, a candidate for President, should get a million votes, and his opponent should get just a few votes below a million, the one having the million would get all the electoral votes of the State. That would still be true under the proposed amendment, as the committee has amended it. As it was proposed, it would have divided the vote. There would be almost a tie in a case like the one cited. But the committee, after a great deal of discussion, concluded, I think with practical unanimity, that it would be unwise to permit a proportional vote to be cast according to the number of votes that a candidate received in a particular State.

I myself became convinced that to permit the division of the vote of a State between different candidates in proportion to the total vote in a Presidential contest would be injurious in the end. While I believe that is a sound position; that in theory it is perfect; and that we ought to have such a system; in the first place, we could not get it adopted because, in my judgment, the States would never ratify it, and that was also the judgment of the committee. In the next place, it would be a very great inducement to fraud all over the country.

Every fraudulent vote that was put into a ballot box in Philadelphia would be counted in the selection of a President of the United States, whereas under present conditions its effect stops with the State of Pennsylvania. If a State is one-sided in an election, as that State usually is, in the final result there would be no harm, but everywhere in the United States, if the proportional voting system were adopted, as this proposed amendment originally provided, there would be an inducement to have cast as many fraudulent votes as possible. The great majority of localities in the United States are opposed to anything of that kind, and do not permit such illegal voting, but there are a few places scattered over the United States where, everybody knows, elections are usually corrupt, and there would be no way of preventing such places from selecting a President for the remainder of the country, where people would not participate in a dishonorable method of voting.

We have here a new provision, and I want to lay it before the Senate. It is not fundamental, but I am in favor of it, and the committee is in favor of it. But I think no one is so much in favor of it that he desires to put anything in the amendment that will affect the chances of approval when it goes before the States for ratification.

We provide in the proposed amendment that when the votes are counted at the joint session, if a candidate for President having the highest number among the Presidential candidates shall receive 35 percent or more of the total vote, he shall be declared elected. Under the present Constitution, where the electors vote, one candidate must have a majority of all the votes, and if no one has a majority, the election of President is thrown into the House of Representatives and the election of a Vice President is thrown into the Senate. In the House the President must be selected from the three highest on the list, and it does not follow by any means that the one finally selected by the House has received 35 percent of the votes. He may have received a very much less percentage. So the contingency where a man can be elected President who has 35 percent only of the votes arises only where, if there were not the 35-percent provision, we might get into a very much worse dilemma. The committee frankly wanted to keep the election of President out of the House of Representatives, and keep the election of Vice President out of the Senate, if we possibly could. So we have that 35-percent provision in the proposed amendment.

If either the Senate or the House does not like that provision, I have on my desk and am prepared to offer the necessary amendments, three of them, which would eliminate the 35-percent provision, and provide, as it is now, that there must be a majority.

After all, in most of the States—and there are very few exceptions, I think—if a candidate for Governor gets a plurality of 1, he is elected. He may be a minority candidate; there may be half a dozen other candidates, but the successful candidate has to have only one more than the next highest. He is a minority candidate, and he is elected Governor. That has worked, so far as I know, with perfect satisfaction. The proposed amendment goes a little further than that. The successful candidate must have at least 35 percent of the votes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Referring again to the subject we discussed a moment ago, is it the Senator's understanding of this measure that the names of all candidates for President would be put down in one column and the names of all candidates for Vice President in another column?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; that is not my understanding. I think the State would arrange the ballot as it desired. The Governor and Lieutenant Governor of a State are comparable to the President and Vice President of the United States, and I do not know of any State that provides by law that the names of candidates for Governor shall be in one column and the names of candidates for Lieutenant Governor in another, although there could be that kind of a law.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think they do so provide.

Mr. NORRIS. They may do so.

Mr. TYDINGS. We do not have a Lieutenant Governor in Maryland, but it is my recollection that in States where there is a Lieutenant Governor, the names for all candidates for Governor are in one general block, to be voted for by 1 vote, and the names of all candidates for Lieutenant Governor are in another block.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand the Senator. I understood the Senator to say they were in different columns.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mean in separate blocks.

Mr. NORRIS. If we use the piece of paper I have in my hand as a ballot, the names of three candidates for Governor, we will say, will be set out up here [indicating]. The next office on the list would probably be that of Lieutenant Governor, and that would come here [indicating]. I think most of the ballots are so prepared now, although they do not have to be.

Mr. TYDINGS. If that would be the result under the Senator's amendment, I should like to offer an amendment which would result in the President and Vice President being voted upon by a single cross mark, so that the vote would be for Hoover and Curtis, or for Roosevelt and Garner, for instance. But I should not want to vote for an amendment which would put the Presidential candidates all together, and then, under them, in a separate block, all the Vice-Presidential candidates. If the Senator feels that that is what would happen under his amendment, I should like to have time to prepare an amendment to that particular phase of the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that would happen.

Mr. TYDINGS. I cannot do it hurriedly, because I should not want to tamper with the Constitution without having any proposed amendment absolutely correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I should be very glad to have the Senator from Maryland offer his amendment. I have no objection to testing the sentiment of the Senate on it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I cannot now offer the amendment, but if the Senator would let the matter go over until tomorrow I should be very glad to work on the amendment this afternoon, and have it ready to present to the Senate the first thing tomorrow morning.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Suppose we go on with the joint resolution now.

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall try to have the amendment ready today.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall try to help the Senator as much as I can.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICKINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the language on page 4, line 7, and the language on page 4, line 25. Apparently it is the intention to provide that the choice for President in the case covered by section 2 shall be from the persons having the three highest number of votes, but the choice of Vice President shall be from the persons having the two highest numbers of votes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Would not that have the effect of making it practically certain that in such a case the President and Vice President would belong to different parties?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I think it would not.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The choice of President is from the three highest, and the choice of Vice President is from the two highest.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator know that we have had that situation existing for over 100 years? We have it now. It has not resulted in the way the Senator suggests. We have had that situation ever since we have had the Constitution.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is true so far as the Constitution is concerned, but now when we are changing it and are trying to accommodate ourselves to the development by which the President and Vice President are actually chosen by the people rather than by the electors, it seems to me that we ought to seize the opportunity to make the method uniform.

Mr. NORRIS. How would the Senator suggest making it uniform?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. By making the choice from the three highest in each instance. May I also call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the language on page 4, line 7, "not exceeding three", seems to modify the word "votes", instead of the word "persons", as no doubt the Senator intended.

Mr. NORRIS. The language is:

The persons having the highest numbers of Presidential votes not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President—

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Grammatically, the phrase "not exceeding three" modifies the word "votes", and, of course, it is intended that it should modify the word "persons." May I not suggest to the Senator that it should be amended to read "then from the three persons having the highest numbers of votes"?

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator will find, if he looks at the Constitution, that here we have followed the language of the present Constitution.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not have the language of the Constitution before me, but as a matter of grammatical construction the phrase "not exceeding three" modifies the word "votes", instead of the word "persons", which it should modify.

Mr. NORRIS. That language, I think, is copied from the present constitutional provision.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator from Wyoming is confusing the exceptional cases with the general election. This provision applies only where the people fail to register a choice and where the election is thrown into the House of Representatives, which is not likely to occur very often. It has only occurred twice in our country's history. I think that is a fair conclusion.

I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, if it will not interfere with his discussion of the joint resolution. I have not had a chance to study it. It has not been called to my attention until today. Will the proposed constitutional amendment in its operation have the effect of removing the possibility, which now exists, of having the popular vote go one way and the State vote another?

Mr. NORRIS. No. I am sorry to say to the Senator that that is a defect which will still exist, and the only way we could avoid that would be to vote down the amendments and pass the joint resolution as I originally introduced it. That would remedy the situation referred to. But, as I said, I think we might as well face the proposition that with respect to that question we would be running up against an impossibility.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the Senator that the electoral college is a fifth wheel. I think probably it has worked better, however, in failing to operate in accordance with the original plan than if it had been operative the way the Fathers meant, so that the electorate would use their own judgment. I think the blessing has been in the failure of its operation rather than operating the way originally planned.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so, too, I will say to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. It has always appealed to me that the one objectionable feature in the present system lies in the possibility of the electoral vote going one way and the popular vote going the other way. I wonder whether that could be cured. As I understand, the amendment will not destroy the State as a unit in voting?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it will not.

Mr. FESS. We will still have the electoral vote?

Mr. NORRIS. We will still have the electoral vote, with all its evils.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The only way I know of by which that could be done would be to provide that the candidate receiving the highest number of votes in all the States should be declared elected. That would wipe out State lines. That would have to be done. Of course, the difficulty which at once suggests itself in that particular is that the fraudulent practices which would occur in some localities would be calculated to create discontent, and result in contests which might be interminable.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. FESS. And would inject the Federal authority in every State.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I am not convinced that the old method we have, as it now operates, is not a pretty good plan.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as that particular point is concerned, this amendment would not change it. It would operate the same way. In other words, the State is the unit. If we were going to apply the same rule to the counting of the result here in Washington as is applied in all the States, we would have a much simpler method than even this joint resolution proposes, because we would just let the man who had the most votes be the President, as is done in the States with respect to the State officers. If it were undertaken to make a rule which would be proportional, and divide the Presidential vote of a State up in proportion to the votes cast in the State, we should then have one rule applying to a national election and a different rule applying to State elections, in which officials are elected by a majority of the votes cast.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I take it that the primary purpose of this joint resolution is to change the method of electing the President and Vice President so that the electors shall vote directly for the candidates rather than for Presidential electors who, when chosen, vote for the candidates. That is the primary purpose?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. President, what I am about to say will probably not appeal to some Senators, but to me, and I think to the people of the country, it does appeal. I have seen in my own life several contests in the leading political parties over the Presidential issue, when each party was controlled, probably, by special interests. How much do the rank and file have to do with the nomination of a President? They sometimes do have something to do with it and accomplish it, I concede. But too often a national convention is operated behind the scenes, and the result is when we come to elections that the people who vote have a choice between two evils, and nothing else.

It is impractical, although it could be done in theory, under our system for a new party or an independent candidate or set of candidates to make any headway within the time after the national conventions meet and the election. It is too expensive. They would have to organize in every State in the Union by the division of the States into districts where they would elect Presidential electors. One could not within the time allowed be very successful in creating an organization which would be effective and sufficient. So the people abide by the choice of the national conventions, and the national conventions have often been manipulated, as everyone knows, by people and political machines having special interests at stake, and that go to national conventions in order to get what they want. If they can control two national conventions they can then go fishing and let the people fight it out on a false issue, and that sometimes happens.

I presume every State in connection with the election of a Governor provides for the method by which an independent candidate for Governor may run without going to any great expense. If it were possible to do the same thing in a national election it would put political parties on guard, they knowing that if they should fail to carry out what the people reasonably expect, then both their candidates would, perhaps, be defeated.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Nebraska if I may now recur to the question of grammar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Nebraska stated that he was under the impression that the language appearing in the resolution on page 4, line 7, was copied from the present provision of the Constitution. I now have that provision before me. It reads:

> And if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three.

That language in the Constitution is, of course, perfectly grammatical, but the language of the resolution now before the Senate reads:

> From the persons having the highest numbers of Presidential votes not exceeding three.

So the phrase "not exceeding three", as I before stated, modifies the word "votes", and not the word "persons", as was intended——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Whereas in the Constitution itself the phrase is grammatical and modifies the word "numbers."

That is true also with respect to the present provision of the Constitution for the selection of a Vice President.

The language of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution reads:

> Then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President.

And in the original Constitution as it was adopted before the adoption of the twelfth amendment the language was:

> And if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said House shall in like manner choose the President—

And so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. What change would the Senator suggest?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. My suggestion is that the language in line 6 be changed to read as follows:

> Then from the three persons having the highest numbers of Presidential votes.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senator also suggests striking out the words "not exceeding three" in the other place?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I suggest that the words "not exceeding three" be stricken out, or that the word "three" be inserted before the word "highest."

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I have no objection to that. I think that would clarify it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. And a similar amendment should be made on line 25.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would prepare his amendments and present them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I am concerned, I shall not object to the amendments.

Section 3 proposes to so graft onto the Constitution an authority which perhaps it now has but which is at least doubtful. Where there is a contest in the joint session as between more than one set of certificates coming from a State, if when the electoral collage or the joint session meets to count the votes it should be found that in one State or a number of States there were several sets of candidates, each purporting to be the legal one, the proposed amendment would give Congress the right to pass a law at any time it pleases to provide a method by which any such disagreement may be settled. Such a condition at one time confronted us with a very serious danger, and it is likely to do so again.

Mr. President, I am anxious to hear from Senators about the 35-percent provision. I have been criticized somewhat, as the committee has, for putting it in. There is some objection to it on the part of some. While I believe in it, and like it as it is now, I want to strike it out if it is going to endanger the success of this amendment, because it is not material. It lessens the possibility of something going wrong when the election is thrown into the House of Representatives. I think every Member of the Senate realizes that we ought to let the people settle such a controversy, if we can do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Before passing to the important questions involved in the joint resolution, I note that on line 12, page 4, and again on line 5, page 5, the word "accordingly" is used in a sense that is not quite clear to me. I read from line 12, page 4:

> If said list of three cannot be ascertained because of two or more persons having received an equal number of votes, then said list shall be increased accordingly.

The same sentence is made to apply also on page 5.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. In the first instance it applies to the President; and on page 5 to the Vice President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Except in one case there is a list of two and in the other a list of three.

Let me say that there is another provision in the joint resolution which I neglected to state is entirely new to the Constitution. It is not necessary to have it in here, of course, but I do not see any harm in it, and I think it would avoid a possible danger that might arise. Suppose there were three candidates for Vice President having an equal number of the Vice-Presidential votes, and the election were thrown into the Senate. The present Constitution provides that the Senate must elect the Vice President from the two highest on the list. But suppose there are not two highest but there are three highest—and, as a matter of fact, there may be four, or there may be one standing out very prominently with very nearly a majority—under our present Constitution, if we had a candidate who had received 49 percent of the votes, he still would not be elected; we should have to elect a Vice President and below him might come four or five candidates all with the same number of votes, or there might be but two with the same number of votes, and the Senate would be required to elect a Vice President from the two highest on the list.

We should be confronted with an impossible condition. The language to which the Senator from Arkansas has called attention is intended to remedy that situation. If we do not have a list of two, on account of there being ties, the list is increased accordingly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is the use of the word "accordingly" which troubles me.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a little doubtful, I concede. In the sense in which it is used there, I think there could be no doubt as to its meaning, but I am as anxious, as is everybody, to have it perfectly plain. If this amendment is to be proposed to the Constitution, we want to have it right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, in changing the language of the Constitution, we all wish to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that perfectly; but I am wondering if the direction given there for procedure is so definite that no two courses might be presented as an option. In other words, just what would occur if the condition arose for a further increase in the list? What would then happen?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean under this amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; under this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. For instance, we are required by the provision in the joint resolution to elect a Vice President from the highest on the list. Suppose there are three men all having an equal number of votes, I think under this language that our list would be three instead of two and we would select any one of the three.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is there to prevent adding two to the list, for instance?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Suppose that a condition should arise under which the individual who would be in fourth place for President should have a tie vote with somebody else.

Mr. NORRIS. Under this provision he would not be in it at all; there would be two ahead of him, and he would not be counted at all. Suppose Mr. A had 40 votes and Mr. B——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But I am assuming now the necessity for increasing the list "accordingly." I am just wondering what increasing the list "accordingly" means.

Mr. NORRIS. I may be wrong, but I think——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I may be wrong, but I have had no opportunity to study the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. The word "accordingly" here refers to the fact that we are faced with a condition where we have more than two on the list and where the list will be increased, it may be by one, it may be by two, and I suppose conditions might arise when there might be three or four.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, would it not mean just one in every instance? Suppose the two lowest have an equal number of votes; we have the highest, and then the next highest, and then the next two have exactly the same number of votes; so we would not know which of them to select; and if we increase the number "accordingly" it means that we would have both of the two who were tied for the lowest place, and therefore we would have four.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We would, then, have five.

Mr. LOGAN. No; just four.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We have two who are tied to start with; then we have the second on the list, which makes three; and then we have two others who are tied. That is the point I am raising.

Mr. NORRIS. That could happen.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and the word "accordingly" is quite indefinite and ambiguous, it seems to me, in this connection. Its primary meaning is—

Agreeably; suitably; in a manner conforming, as those who live in faith and good works will be rewarded accordingly.

The second definition is—

In assent or compliance; acquiescence—

And so forth. It seems to me the word does not mean very much in the way it is used in the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may be right, but it seems to me we are confronted with a constitutional provision which says, in effect, we are to elect a Vice President from the two highest on the list, but it is provided that others shall be added. If we cannot ascertain those two because of there being an equal number of votes received by more than two, then the list shall be increased accordingly. I think "accordingly" expresses the idea, and if it does not do so, then let us put in some word which will.

We are confronted with a condition that makes it impossible to comply with the constitutional provision. We have been in that condition for 150 years and would have been unable to comply if anything had ever happened to throw the election into the House. It may happen in the next election, and we ought to provide for it. While it is not necessarily a part of the primary idea, the committee thought we had better put in a provision to take care of such a contingency.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator any opinion as to whether failure to elect by the people and the consequent throwing of the election into the House of Representatives would occur more frequently under the amendment than under the present system?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would not occur any more frequently.

Mr. FESS. Then my reaction would be against the 35-percent clause. That is simply a precautionary provision.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all. I do not think there will be any greater likelihood of a President being elected by the Congress with the amendment than without it. I do not know any reason why the chances should be increased.

Mr. FESS. The mere suggestion that the votes of 35 percent of the voters might determine who should be elected is rather offensive to me.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have a vote of the Senate. If there is any reasonable number of Senators who feel that we ought to strike out the 35-percent provision, I would be in favor of striking it out. I think it is a good provision, to allow for a contingency, to lessen the number of times elections might be thrown into the House.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I suggest to the Senator that before we go into details there are some fundamental implications involved which I wish to discuss very frankly and very respectfully? I can scarcely raise those questions in interrogatories to the Senator, but before we enter upon a detailed textual consideration of the joint resolution I think it might be wise if we should have general discussion. As soon as the Senator concludes—and I rose only for the purpose of suggesting it to him—I desire to submit those ideas to him for the purpose of further discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the Senator knows I do not intend to do anything that would retard debate or consideration. I am interested as are other Senators. I have no ax to grind. There is no politics in it. What we ought to do for the good of the country I think is to adopt the amendment. I think it would be quite a help if the amendment were embodied in the Constitution. I do not want to delay debate, and I do not want to prevent the offering of amendments. I should cheerfully agree even to putting the measure over if Senators feel they would like to have time to look further into it and prepare amendments or debate it. I shall have no objection if the delay is reasonable.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It may divert the Senator from the line of argument he is pursuing, but a suggestion was made some time ago, I think by the Senator himself, or possibly by one of those who interrupted him, that the present system had not worked satisfactorily. I was wondering, taking into account our rather long national life, if the Senator feels that the present system of electing the President of the United States is not perfectly satisfactory. The House of Representatives has been called upon twice only to act in the selection of a President.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think it has worked satisfactorily, but even if it had, if we have machinery that is absolutely unnecessary I think we ought to get rid of it. In my judgment, if the amendment shall be adopted political parties will be much more careful in the future in their national conventions. We have seen national conventions which have been absolutely controlled, and they may be in the future, of course, but there will be a danger involved. The simplification of the procedure of a direct vote, without the necessity of an enormous expenditure of time and money to get machinery into operation to put a candidate for President in the field, is going to be like a policeman standing at the corner drug store. It will not be robbed while he is there, but will be if he is taken away.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Probably the controlling consideration which prompted the creation of the electoral college was the belief in the minds of the framers of the Constitution that it would be impracticable, if not impossible, for the individual electors to familiarize themselves with the qualifications and views of the respective candidates whose names might be presented, in such a way as to enable them intelligently to exercise their franchise. That condition, of course, has practically disappeared.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In every political campaign the candidates become very well known to the voters themselves. We hear in the meetings and in the demonstrations preceding an election slogans which epitomize or which are intended to epitomize the policies and views of the candidate. In other words, there is no doubt in my mind that the machinery of the electoral college has become in a sense obsolete by a change in conditions which I have only partially described.

Modern means of communication and the quick dissemination of news by newspapers, radio, telephone, and telegraph have brought the remote parts of the country closely together and have enabled citizens who are interested in public affairs to obtain quite definite information concerning both issues and candidates. The situation has very materially changed.

While all that is true, the electoral college has functioned effectively and efficiently. I think it is consistent with progress to give the individual voter an opportunity to vote directly for the candidate. At the same time the language of the amendment needs a little more careful study than we are able to give it just at this time. I do not wish to make at this juncture any suggestion for a continuance of the subject, but I have the thought, which the Senator from Nebraska has indicated is in his mind, that after the debate shall have progressed to a point where the issues have been made clear, we might very well consider allowing the proposed amendment to go over for a time for further deliberation.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that if the time is limited so that we shall not have delay. For instance, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has left the Chamber, and he told me when he left that he was going to prepare an amendment. While I am very much opposed to the amendment he is planning to prepare, I am in favor of giving him time to prepare it. He fears that he will not be able to get it ready today. I do not expect to crowd a vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; I understand.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] desires to debate the general principles; and I am perfectly willing to go on as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, with the understanding that we shall not vote today, for instance; or, if the Senator desires to take up something else, and there is no further debate on this matter, I am willing to have it laid over until tomorrow, or something of that kind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to have the debate proceed to a point where it will make clear the important issues that are involved in the joint resolution; and then, if the Senator from Nebraska thinks it advisable, I should be glad to assist in arranging to take up some other measure temporarily.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. For instance, this proposed constitutional amendment is not just like a matter of legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No.

Mr. NORRIS. It will have to be approved by the State legislatures; and I do not want to put out anything here that will not be approved. I want to meet all logical and fair objections, if I can, before the amendment is framed into law. Therefore I have no objection to any reasonable debate; and I concede that there are some things in the amendment, such as the provision for increasing the list, which we could strike out entirely, and the condition would be just the same as it is now. It would not be worse. We endeavored to improve the condition a little. Perhaps we have made it worse. If so, let us amend the joint resolution.

I desire also to have a vote on the proposition which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is preparing. It is only fair to him and fair to all of us. I also ask Senators to consider the 35-percent clause. I realize that there is some objection to it, and I do not want the joint resolution to pass with that in it if there is any serious objection even on the part of a good-sized minority, because I feel that we can in that respect leave things as they are now, and, of course, the condition will be no worse than it is now.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I was not privileged to hear the Senator discuss the part of the joint resolution which refers to the possibility of an independent candidate, and I am wondering if I may ask the Senator to amplify that for a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. I was about to discuss the point raised by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who is planning to offer an amendment providing that a voter must vote for both President and Vice President. I desire, however, to withhold my discussion of that matter until the Senator offers the amendment. I am very much opposed to anything of the kind, and I should very much dislike to see it put in the constitutional amendment; but I think I should reserve the debate on it until the Senator from Maryland, who is now absent preparing the amendment, brings it in.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator, before he leaves the floor, consider this amendment: On page 3, line 8, after the word "votes", insert "by States."

I do not ask the Senate to agree to the amendment now, but I think that will relieve the paragraph from ambiguity.

Mr. NORRIS. At first blush, I think that would improve it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I entirely agree with the Senator from Nebraska that the electoral college has proved to be an anachronism. I fully agree with the Senator that the electoral college has not served the purposes which evidently were in the minds of the framers of the Constitution when the Constitution was adopted; but I should like to have the Senator amplify the statement he has just made that the adoption of this constitutional amendment would in any way change the situation as to nominations by national conventions, or control of national conventions, or that an improvement of politics in any way would take place.

In other words, if the Senator will yield just a moment further, under the present constitutional provision there is scarcely an individual in the United States so unintelligent that he does not know exactly for whom he is voting for President and Vice President when he marks a party ballot to vote for certain electors. In at least one State of the Union—the State of Illinois—it has been provided by law that the names of the candidates for President and Vice President shall be written on the ballot, and that a vote in the circle for the party candidates for President and Vice President shall be counted as a vote for electors carrying the pledge to support those candidates for President and Vice President. Of course, that statute has not yet been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, because a test case has never been brought.

It seems to me that the only effect of the Senator's amendment is to remove some unnecessary timber in the structure, but that it does not in any way tend to bring about any substantial political or governmental reform.

Mr. NORRIS. If the amendment does just what the Senator from Missouri says he thinks it does, we ought to pass the joint resolution. If it does not do any more than that, we ought to pass it.

Mr. CLARK. That may be; but I was very much interested in the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that the amendment would bring about a difference in the machinery of nomination and in the control of political conventions.

Mr. NORRIS. I have seen in my own short life, and so have all other Senators here—because they are all older than I am—what has repeatedly happened in Presidential campaigns. I shall not mention any names, because I desire to avoid the possibility of any party feeling in this matter. I have not any party feeling in it. Nobody ought to have any party feeling in the consideration of this subject; but we have seen a great political party, one of the two leading parties, controlled by a few men. We have seen men nominated whom I know, and we all know, the people did not like. A few bosses put over the ticket. A political machine put it over.

Suppose both national conventions are controlled in that way—what can the people do about it? What could they do if that were done with the nominations for Governor in the State of Missouri or the State of Nebraska? What would happen there? There would be an independent candidate, and probably he would get a large vote. The fact that that is possible in the case of a Governor without any great expense, without any great organization, makes the parties careful when they make their nominations; and they do not override the will or the wishes of the people, as sometimes occurs in conventions where a party nomination absolutely means an election.

Mr. CLARK rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator not to interrupt me yet. Let me finish this thought.

If the Constitution were amended so as to abolish the electoral college, what would happen in a case of that kind? Why would the condition be any better? It would be better because under the present system independent candidates for President have been nominated once or twice, even in my lifetime, and they always went up against the fact that it cost two or three million dollars to get an organization together, and there were only a few months in which to do it; and since the laws of most of the States provided for voting for electors only, all that the voters saw were the names of the electors on the ballots; and in one State, in a recent Presidential campaign, where the laws of that State did not permit it, the names of the new independent electors did not appear on the ballot at all. The voters had to write them in, and they all had to write the same thing; and so great was the feeling in the State that the independent candidate came very near carrying the State. It was a wonderful exhibition of intelligent voting—it seemed to me it was intelligent—although it did not win.

Suppose we did not have any electoral college. Suppose the thing should happen which I have described, that both political parties should nominate candidates for President who were objectionable to the people. For the purpose of illustration, take somebody who is very objectionable. Suppose both political parties should do it, and the great bulk of the people did not want them. Suppose a convention were called; or, even without a convention, suppose some prominent, well-known American citizen should be by a mass convention, perhaps, or in some other method, induced to permit his name to be used as an independent candidate for President. What would happen? His name could be placed on every official ballot in the United States as easily as the name of an independent candidate for Governor could be placed on the official ballot.

I know men, and other Senators do—we could pick them out, some of them, in this Chamber—who are known all over the country, and if it were known that machines had taken advantage in national conventions where the people could not have a direct voice and vote, if such a condition existed, and some one of these men were announced as an independent candidate, almost overnight in my State, and a similar thing would occur in other States, the necessary petitions to put the name of that man on the official ballot would be signed without the expenditure of a dollar, and his name would be on the official ballot, and the people would take care of the rest.

I have given the Senator an exaggerated case, I admit. I have exaggerated purposely; but that is what might happen, and to some degree it would happen.

The result of adopting this amendment doing away with the electoral college would be that the men who operate national conventions would be more careful. They would not permit some boss behind the scenes to cast four or five hundred votes for this man or that man.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield now——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. So far as my State is concerned, that, of course, being the one with which I am most familiar, it is just as easy to have an independent ticket for President now as it is to have an independent ticket for Governor, which is very simple in the State of Missouri. If there be States in which it is more difficult, I should be entirely in favor of improving the procedure; and I do not want the Senator to think I am opposing the pending joint resolution, because I am in favor of it.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think the Senator is opposing it.

Mr. CLARK. I do think, however, that the reforms at which the Senator is aiming, and with which I have the most intense sympathy, will not be accomplished by the passage of the joint resolution.

So far as an improvement in the control of national conventions is concerned, I think the only possible way really to improve and reform that situation is by a system of national Presidential primaries, regulated by law, which could be brought about by statute instead of by constitutional amendment. In other words, I do not believe that the mere fact that the candidates' names appear on the ballot is especially important in the modern situation, where practically all the voters know the names of the candidates anyway, and in some States, such as my own, in addition to the names of the electors, the names of the candidates for President and Vice President may be printed at the head of the ticket. I do not believe, therefore, that the mere elimination of the electoral college would accomplish the reform which the Senator from Nebraska and I both desire.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would accomplish it, though probably not in the degree that I hope. The Senator thinks it would not do any harm, and it might possibly do some good. He also says that in the State of Missouri the name of an independent candidate for President can be placed on the ballot without any difficulty or expense whatever. Does the Senator take into consideration that to do that in Missouri there would have to be Presidential electors, and that he would have to get them? He cannot reach up and pull them out of the air.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly I realize that; but I also realize that, as a practical political matter, if one has enough strength, enough potential public support, there is no trouble about getting electors.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a great deal of trouble in getting electors. There is even now frequently trouble with the organizations which are set up, and if the Senator undertook, in Missouri, to put an independent candidate for President in the field, and to get together the necessary machinery, he would find that it would cost him a great deal of money. He would have to get as many Presidential electors on the ballot as the State is entitled to. Tom, Dick, and Harry, even though they were graduates of college, would not always know all the men picked up from all over the State of Missouri.

In the State of Nebraska we can handle it more easily. We have a law providing that there shall be no names of Presidential electors on the official ballot, and none are printed. The names of the candidates are printed. If every State would so provide, the reasons I am urging for this proposed amendment would partially disappear. I admit that it could be done; but, as a practical proposition, it will not be done.

The Constitution of the United States provides for the electoral college, and uses the word "appointed"; that the electors shall be "appointed" as the legislatures of the States shall determine. A legislature can provide, as the Legislature of Nebraska has provided, that they shall be appointed by the Governor, and the necessary machinery set up to insure that the Governor will follow the wishes of the people who have just voted for President and Vice President, and whose votes are to be canvassed, just as those for Governor are canvassed. So the Governor of a State knows how to make the appointments. He appoints the electors and sends them to a college to vote, and they send a couple of messengers to Washington with the vote.

Mr. CLARK. There is no essential difference, then, between the system now in effect in the State of Nebraska and the system which the Senator proposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there is some difference. What is the use of this fifth wheel, when the electors are appointed?

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator in his opinion as to that.

Mr. NORRIS. If every State did what it could do under the Constitution of the United States, the method of choosing President and Vice President would be much simplified, I admit. But we cannot accomplish that. We cannot control the States. The State of Nebraska was years and years and years in getting that kind of a law. If we could provide by an act of Congress that that should be done, that would do away with part of the reason behind this proposed amendment, I concede.

The Senator says now that the thing to do is to have a Presidential primary.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with that. However, that is a separate proposition, but, along the line of the suggestion of the Senator, I think that is the only way to accomplish what he desires.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that that would be a big help, though I do not think that is the only way to accomplish what we are after, and I do not think we are going to get it. I have been advocating that ever since I have been in public life. I once introduced a bill in the House of Representatives looking to that end, and I had the approval of the first Roosevelt and the approval of President Wilson, but I did not get anywhere with it. There are a good many serious objections, of course, to having a national primary, but I am for it; I should like to have it. This amendment does not stand in the way of it. We ought to have it. We need it, and whether we get this amendment adopted or not, we ought to have such a primary. I do not have as much faith in it as the Senator has, perhaps, and, more than that, I do not believe we are going to get it. To my mind, it is no objection to this amendment to say that it will do some good, but that there is some other way that would be better. I should like to have it. If a national primary is also needed, I say for God's sake let us have them both.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to have the Senator understand that I was not making the suggestion as an objection to the pending joint resolution, because I am for it.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that perfectly. I have nothing further to say, if the Senator from Michigan desires to debate the question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the proposed constitutional amendment, less in respect to its text than in respect to its implications.

It seems to me that this is vastly more than a mere proposition to abandon the electoral college, which it may be correctly said has become very much of a fifth wheel to a wagon so far as its physical function is concerned. The abandonment of the electoral college as a mere machine to register the automatic electoral disposition of the American people would be perfectly logical and appropriate. I have no interest in its maintenance for this purpose. But it seems to me that this problem goes infinitely deeper, and it seems to me that the implications of this proposal in the final analysis are, first, to encourage multiple political parties in the United States, and therefore, secondly, to produce the possibility of minority Presidents of the United States, or else more choices of President by the House of Representatives, instead of by the people themselves. These are the jeopardies to which I wish to address my observations.

I wish to develop this thesis briefly, but with the greatest possible emphasis, because I think the whole system of effective representative government is wrapped up in the maintenance of the existing wellsprings of political activity.

Mr. President, the obvious moving purpose behind the proposed amendment is to make it easier for independent candidates to run for President; to make it easier for new parties to be organized, not one, but perhaps many; to make it easier, therefore, in the final analysis, for the transposition to the United States of the continental curse of European politics, namely, multiple parties, bloc government, group control, minority administration of the affairs of the people.

In the report of the Judiciary Committee itself bringing this proposed constitutional amendment to the floor of the Senate it is frankly stated that—

> Under our present system, when the two great political parties have made their nominations, it is almost an impossibility, and always a very expensive operation, for any independent candidate to run for the office of President or Vice President. It is imperative that such independent candidates should, in a very few months, organize the entire United States and nominate in each State a set of candidates for the offices of Presidential electors.

The able Senator from Nebraska has been entirely frank in his discussion of that proposition. I cordially agree that there ought to be some means of a greater warranty of political virtue and integrity in the nominating conventions which choose the Presidential and Vice-Presidential nominees of the two great existing parties. But that need, no matter how challenging, cannot suffice, in my humble judgment, to justify the fundamental assault upon the two major party political system in the United States. I consider that the proposed amendment is, in its essence and purpose, intended to be an assault upon the two major party system.

What this amendment primarily presumes to seek is a simplified Presidential ballot on the surface of things, but its real purpose is and its major result will be to encourage new and additional political parties in the United States by making it easy for independent candidates to run for President of the United States.

The net result is calculated to be a greatly increased number of candidates for President. It is calculated to encourage vigorous self-serving minorities to seek expression and dominion in this electoral fashion. It is easily calculated, I repeat, to transfer to the United States the vice of continental European politics, namely, government by blocs, government by minorities, and, ultimately, a great multiplicity of political units which defy any hope for continuity of administration in our Federal affairs at Washington.

If this multiplicity of parties, Mr. President, is a curse in closely knit Europe, it would be an utterly aggravated plague in so vast and diverse a land as is the United States of America. We have difficulty enough to escape this plague under existing circumstances and without new encouragements to it.

The proposed amendment frankly admits its own probable eventuality by proposing that any Presidential candidate who gets 35 percent of the votes of the States shall be elected. Thus we shall be embarked toward a permanent process of minority Presidents. I doubt whether we should ever again have a majority President. At any rate, the system would be made to order for transferring to the national political field those well-known and oft-embraced tricks and intrigues in our lesser political units which too frequently deliberately clutter up a ballot with extra candidates for the direct purpose of dividing the majority opposition and permitting a close-knit minority to have its way.

The vice of manipulated national conventions, to which the Senator from Nebraska appropriately adverts, in the final analysis is a lesser vice, Mr. President, than the vice of a standing invitation to the creation of multiple Presidential candidacies in the United States on diverse and sundry independent bloc tickets, perhaps for the deliberate purpose of permitting some particular minority to gerrymander the net result into a 35-percent election. Thus the fundamental genius of our basic philosophy, to wit, majority rule, is not only jeopardized but actually undermined by deliberate license. Any such constitutional change would be entirely dangerous to my conception of the Republic.

The Senator from Nebraska himself very frankly questions the 35-percent clause. I think there is serious doubt in his own mind whether the 35-percent clause is even tentatively justified. But, Mr. President, if we are going to encourage multiple parties in the United States and numerous independent candidatures for the Presidency, if we do not have a 35-percent clause, and we persist in a 50-percent clause such as governs the situation today, then in my view of the situation we will inevitably throw every Presidential election into the House of Representatives.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator objects to 35 percent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I object to the entire system, but I say——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator objects to 50 percent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I say that if we are going to proceed in this fashion, 35 percent is better than nothing.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator rather have it 50 percent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator cannot create a situation under the terms of this amendment to which he can at all subscribe.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator think it was a greater evil to have 50 percent than 35 percent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The answer depends upon whether it is a greater evil to have Presidents elected by the House of Representatives or to have them elected by 35 percent of the people. That equation comes down to that proposition.

I think it is an evil to have them elected either way, either by 35 percent of the people or by the House of Representatives. In a choice between these evils, if one or the other must be embraced, I presume I should prefer to change the 35 percent to 50 percent.

Mr. President, I am opposed to any such eventualities in our national political affairs for the following reasons:

First, I consider it is wise, so far as humanly possible, to retain the two-major-party system in the United States, so that a majority of the electorate, speaking through the States, may have a clean-cut opportunity to speak for itself and choose a majority President. To subdivide our Presidential politics into numerous independent or group or bloc candidacies will inevitably deny majority rule on the part of the people, and correspondingly deny all possibility of united administration policy at Washington after the election is over.

This latter consideration is just as important as the former, because if this Government of ours, under our representative system, ever breaks up into the types of blocs which curse European politics, a curse which I believe unwittingly is invited by this amendment, there will cease to be any possibility for a continuity of administrative policy in Washington, because the entire situation will be in chaos. I cannot escape the conviction that both of these trends, no matter how nobly meditated—and I am referring to the trends which are in the mind of the Senator from Nebraska—are the reverse of liberalism in the accepted sense of our representative American institutions.

Second, I believe it is wise to require of any Presidential nominee who may ever be in real reach of the White House that he shall possess a national character and a national appeal and not be the mere product of some localized aspiration or protest or of some conniving minority which knows exactly what it wants.

We get that type sometimes today in our existing situation, as the Senator from Nebraska with justice has said, but at least the vice at the present time is confined to our nominating system, and it has not been carried specifically into the Constitution of the United States in respect to the final election.

If there be some transient appeal in the thought that these special groups of our people ought to be more easily articulate because they will often be the less privileged of our citizens, I point out that the net result might actually place this new opportunity in the hands of special interests which are powerful in their material resources and, best of all, able to organize this country for the purpose of capturing a 35-percent sector of our Presidential electorate.

I am dropping back to one of the wisest of all the admonitions which were written into the Federalist Papers, Mr. President:

> No man can be sure that he may not be tomorrow the victim of a spirit of injustice by which he may be a gainer today.

And on the proposition that we need to preserve the mechanical requirements—referring to the electoral college—which assure us against Presidents lacking a national character and a national appeal, I quote one of the most solemn of all of the warnings in the Federalist Papers (No. 68):

> Talents for low intrigue and the little arts of popularity may alone suffice to elevate a man to the first honors in a single State; but it will require other talents and a different kind of merit to establish him in the esteem and confidence of the whole Union, or of so considerable a portion of it as would be necessary to make him a successful candidate for the distinguished office of President of the United States.

I submit in all seriousness that we are deserting that prospectus when we invite localized bloc organizations to submit their candidates for President on the basis of localized appeal, in many instances, or on the basis of a self-seeking minority objective in many other instances. Senators know to what an extent ambitious minorities, striving for some special advantage, are already bombarding Government these days. They should not be armed with new and perhaps irresistible weapons.

Parties may change. One may absorb and succeed another. But in the long run it is best, as Henry Clay once observed, if there are but two dominant parties—"one to watch the other." It is all very well for voters, as individuals, to be independent in their electoral judgment. An intelligent ballot must, of necessity, be a scrutinizing ballot; in other words, it must always be independent to the extent of sustaining a party only so long as a party deserves to be sustained. But it is one thing for the voter to be independent of irrefragable party ties, and quite another thing for independent groups to supersede all parties and thus factionalize American elections to an extent which will defy all possibility of dominant electoral trends and concentrated responsibility in government.

There is another objection, Mr. President. The Judiciary Committee report itself correctly asserts that—

> It is extremely desirable to prevent the election of a President from being thrown into the House of Representatives.

The Senator from Nebraska has reasserted his own belief in that proposition. It is emphatically right from my point of view. The only scandals involving Presidential counts have arisen when Presidential elections have passed out of the electoral college and into the Congress—as when Hamilton rallied the Federalists in 1800 to defeat Aaron Burr's intriguing conspiracy to count Jefferson out of the White House, and when unproven stigma accused Henry Clay of trading votes to John Quincy Adams in 1825 in return for a Cabinet portfolio, and when the Hayes-Tilden contest of 1876 all but threatened the possibility of renewed civil war. It is not the Presidential elector who has featured historical charges of broken faith. It is in Congress itself—when a majority of the States' votes fail any one candidate for President—that this menace lies, if it lies at all; and the elimination of the electoral college would tend to throw more, rather than less, of these contests into the House of Representatives.

It would particularly throw more of them into the House of Representatives under the 35-percent clause in the pending constitutional amendment which we have been discussing; but it makes no difference whether the 35-percent clause is there or not, Mr. President, as I see the situation. The very fact that we shall have invited a multiplication of political parties means that we have invited a substantial subdivision of the total popular vote for President of the United States, and that subdivision inevitably, as time goes on, is going to produce the failure of an electoral majority, and, in my judgment, is going in every single Presidential year to increase the chance of throwing the selection into the House of Representatives.

It is universally agreed that it is not good to be forced to the recourse of an indirect election of a President by the House and a Vice President by the Senate. In the long congressional debates of more than a century when various unsuccessful efforts have been made to change the presidential system, opposing factions have found invariable concert upon this one point.

> One central truth illuminates the wearisome discussions before the Electoral Commission of 1887—

> that the great effort of the framers of the Constitution was to make the Executive independent of the legislative, and to place the election of the President beyond the reach or control of Congress.

The pending constitutional amendment assumes to minimize this hazard by its 35-percent clause. Such medicine might easily be even more deadly than the disease, since it would clearly and specifically commission a minority President. But, worse than that, I fear the medicine often would never get a chance to work.

Why? Because when our national political trends once split us into numerous independent political groups, it is easily conceivable that the drift cannot and will not be stopped at this arbitrarily chosen 35-percent dead-line, but will so divide our ballots that the 35 percent will rarely, if ever, be reached.

In other words, it seems to me that the amendment becomes a direct encouragement to the election of Presidents of the United States by the House of Representatives instead of by the sovereign patriots of this Republic.

Mr. President, just one passing comment upon the practical mathematical phase, and I am now dealing with the 35-percent clause in particular. There are 531 electors and 35 percent of them would be 186. Under the 35 percent clause, the 6 States of New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois would be within 15 electoral votes of control; or the so-called "solid South" would always be within 51 votes of control.

I submit that that ceases to preserve in the Chief Executiveship of the United States that national character which is not only essential but which is wisely safeguarded by the theory and the existing process of the Constitution.

One may take a different contemplation and calculation, although I hesitate to submit this thought, lest it encourage too many votes for the Senator's amendment. There are 135 electoral votes in the so-called "solid South" that will rarely go anywhere except in one direction; and under the pending amendment, with the 35-percent clause included, the solid South is within 31 votes of the choice and dictation of a President of the United States in every election, so long as the field is subdivided by various independent groups and blocs and subdivided political parties which are invited into activity by the very nature and purpose of the pending amendment.

Mr. President, I realize that the spirit of innovation is upon the land. I do not complain of that. I have supported many of the innovations; I realize that new problems demand new answers, and I am not afraid of them. But this is not a new problem, and there is no need for a new answer, so far as voting directly for President and Vice President of the United States is concerned. That can be done without any change in the Constitution at all by the action of any State legislature which wants to proceed in that direction. I favor it. Voters may be permitted to vote directly for President and Vice President without any constitutional amendment. It is already done in many States. Therefore the service of making intelligent voting easier does not require this fundamental assault upon the basic law of the land. It can be done otherwise. There is no need for constitutional innovation. The innovation rests, first, in the invitation to subdivide and multiply political parties in the United States; and, secondly, to the choice of a President by less than a majority of the people of the United States.

Let us proceed courageously with whatever statutory innovations are necessary in the face of the crisis of the time, but let us not innovate needlessly. It was not necessary to change this particular phase of the Constitution, Mr. President, in order to elect as Chief Executive the greatest innovator of all time. It is fairly easy under the existing system, as has been repeatedly demonstrated, for the popular will to make its expression squarely and emphatically understood and felt. We do not need this innovation in the Constitution itself in order to make popular government articulate. Certainly we dare not extend any hospitality to an innovation which, if I correctly analyze the situation, invites the transfer to this country of the curse of bloc government and multiple parties, which plague the Old World in general and the Continent in particular; and which invites minority Presidents to occupy the White House and govern majorities to whom they are repugnant.

Let us be statutory innovators where the situation requires it. But only in the last and final necessity, when there is no other recourse, let us be innovators upon the Constitution of the United States.

The final words in the last chapters of the Federalist papers speak to us in vivid appeal when we approach the task of remaking any sector of the Constitution. I quote:

> Every man is bound to answer these questions to himself, according to the best of his conscience and understanding, and to act agreeably to the genuine and sober dictates of his judgment. This is a duty from which nothing can give him a dispensation. 'Tis one that he is called upon, nay, constrained by all the obligations that form the bands of society, to discharge sincerely and honestly. No partial motive, no particular interest, no pride of opinion, no temporary passion or prejudice, will justify to himself, to his country, or to his posterity, an improper election of the part he is to act.

The Presidency of the United States is the final badge of our unity, the final defense of our Union, and the final reliance of our institutions. I beg that no casual or cursory considerations shall move us to destroy its safeguards as conceived by the Constitution and as validated by time and experience.

Mr. FESS rose.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I beg pardon, but I did not understand there was an understanding that the Senator from Ohio was to speak. I withhold my motion.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if I understand the situation correctly, there was no understanding about who was to speak, but the understanding was that the constitutional amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska should be debated until such time as it was found desirable to lay it aside on account of amendments which were to be proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). That is as the Chair understood.

Mr. NORRIS. I inquire from the Senator from Ohio if he desires to speak?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the observations just concluded by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] very greatly impressed me and, I think, must have impressed every Senator who listened to what he said. The Senator pointed out some possible results which, if he is not mistaken—and I fear he is not—become very important to us in reaching a final decision of such a question as this proposed amendment. I have not had an opportunity to study the joint resolution. That was no one's fault but my own. Therefore, I had not fully comprehended and do not now fully comprehend all possibilities under it.

When I noted that it would come up, I assumed that it meant to eliminate the obsolete machinery of the electoral college. I assumed that the purpose was to get rid of what is rather a common result in our present election, to wit, the popular vote decreeing one thing and the electoral vote, which would be final, decreeing a different result. If we could get rid of that possibility without destroying the State unit, I should be glad to have it done. I have studied the problem for many years and do not yet see how we could accomplish that object unless we should eliminate the State as a unit in Presidential elections, and I doubt whether we would ever agree to do that.

My understanding is that the purpose of the amendment is to make it impossible for the Nation ever again to be confronted with such a serious crisis as was occasioned in 1876 in the disputed Presidential election. Section 3 of the joint resolution looks to a solution of that problem and to prevent that danger recurring. Whether it would recur is a question.

But I had not looked into the possibilities to which I have referred until the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] called attention to them when he read from the report. He referred to that provision which should make it easier for candidates of independent allegiance to get a hearing. That immediately involves what I regard as one of the most important practices in our Government, of which we cannot rid ourselves without, in my judgment, changing the whole order of a government by public opinion. In other words, any effort to nullify the views of the people, in legislation in a government where public opinion rules, would be a dangerous innovation.

There is no way that I see by which a popular government like ours can ever translate its judgment into decision except through political parties. There never has been any successful method other than that, and I do not believe there ever will be. In order that public opinion may be effective in its judgment, it will not be possible to insure it unless we have a situation where one can affirm and the other deny, which means the two-party system. It is true that our fathers knew nothing about the two-party system. It grew up as a result of the inevitable evolution of a public expressing itself in law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator refers to the fact that in the inception of the Government political parties were unknown. Of course, he has in mind the admonition in Washington's Farewell Address against political parties. Yet the significant fact is that Washington and Hamilton, who collaborated in the Farewell Address, the men who wrote the warning to which the Senator adverts, within their own lifetime in the practical activity of Washington's responsibilities found, before their words were even cold, that they could not function except as there were definitely organized political instrumentalities, two of them, through which to register the popular will.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is accurate in that statement. In the Constitutional Convention, without any effort to name factions, the two schools were very prominent. Ultimately those schools came to be known as the "Federalists" and the "Anti-Federalists." It is now known that that name was a misnomer. The Federalists were the group that believed in more centralized power, while the Anti-Federalists were the opposite. But when we today speak of Federalists we do not refer to those who believe in a centralized power. We call them Nationalists instead of Federalists. Today the Federalist idea is a government by the state, while the Nationalist idea is a government by the people of the state. Those who favored the Constitution were nicknamed "Federalists." That was the Nationalist group which was ultimately allied with Washington and Hamilton and, in a sense, with Madison, although Madison veered over to Jefferson. The Anti-Federalists were those who would better express the view of Jefferson, although Jefferson resented being called an Anti-Federalist.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator does not mean to imply in the observations he is submitting that Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Mason, and others who became the founders of the Democratic Party were not in favor of the Federal Constitution. They all wanted to have amendments to it, and those amendments, denominated 1 to 10, became the Bill of Rights, so that any criticism they had was largely a result of the failure, as they believed, of the Constitution to afford protection to individual rights.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is correct. The expression of philosophy of the anti-Federalists in the Convention ultimately reached the Bill of Rights. I discussed that matter here some days ago. I do not care to repeat it.

On the other hand, those who said the Bill of Rights had no place in the Constitution, led by men like Hamilton, were strongly centralized forces, while Jefferson, although not in the Constitutional Convention, represented the more decentralized forces. There were no political parties by name, as was stated, but they naturally developed. During the administration of Washington, followed by Adams, the Federalists, the dominant party organization, commanded; while the Anti-Federalists gathered strength in opposition continually until by 1800 the Anti-Federalists were elected to office.

Senators will recall that prior to 1804 two persons were voted for as candidates for President. The one receiving the highest vote was declared to be elected President and the one receiving the next highest vote, Vice President. That made it inevitable that there would be one of the parties commanding the Presidency and the other of the parties commanding the Vice Presidency. It so happened that the first President was a Federalist, and the Vice President at that time would be regarded as an anti-Federalist.

Those terms which denominated the two schools, which later grew into distinct political parties, were mere expressions of the thought of the two schools. When they were originally started, without any planning whatever, there was not any such thing in existence as a two-party system. It grew as of necessity, for how would it be possible to have the public opinion expressed in government except through some organization? It would be impossible in any other way. Consequently, by 1812 the Anti-Federalist Party had come to be the commanding force. By 1816 there was scarcely any opposition to the Anti-Federalist Party. Then it was called "Republican", and Jefferson once remarked, "We are all Republicans." When Monroe was elected he really had no opposition, but was elected unanimously.

The first time the people failed to elect a President was in 1800. Then the election was thrown into the House of Representatives. Nothing dangerous resulted from that particular episode. The only result of importance was that of the claim of Aaron Burr that he had just as good a right to contest against Jefferson after they had tied in the electoral college as before the election, although it was universally conceded that Jefferson was the properly elected President, offended such men as Alexander Hamilton; and the Presiding Officer will recall that the decision was finally reached in the State of New York, when, as a result of the influence of Hamilton, the State's vote was cast against Burr on behalf of Jefferson. What seems to be an anomaly in history is that the greatest political opponent of Jefferson was the deciding factor in making him the President in 1800. While that led ultimately to a bitterness that eventuated in a duel resulting in the death of Hamilton, it really ended the influence of Aaron Burr as a factor in the party he represented.

When we think of the two schools represented respectively by Hamilton and by Jefferson, and of the bitterness of the advocates of one toward the other, we sometimes fail to realize the friendship that existed between Jefferson and Hamilton. While it is true that in the Cabinet they differed, they ultimately came to be regarded as men who willingly conceded the honesty and integrity and ability of each other. Those who are familiar with Monticello, which has now been almost completely restored to its original condition, only one group of houses remaining to be rebuilt, will note when it is completely restored, as they enter the hall of the famous Jefferson mansion, on one side of the entrance a bust of Jefferson and on the other side a bust of Hamilton looking into each other's faces. That is very suggestive to me, because the followers of the two schools are apt to think that because these great leaders differed they must have been enemies.

In 1804, in order to avoid having the President of one party and the Vice President of another party, and running the risk of having a tie, as was the case in 1800, the twelfth amendment was adopted, which provided for the present method of electing President and Vice President.

Mr. President, so long as we maintain the two-party system I am not fearful that many elections will be thrown into the House of Representatives. Such an occurrence will be very rare. Of course, the minute we embark on an innovation that will result in doing away with the two-party system and introducing the multiple-party system, we multiply very greatly the likelihood that a decision will not be made by the people. That is the point which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] emphasized and which I think is vastly important.

In 1824, for the second time, there was a failure to elect a President by the people. The election went to the House of Representatives. As I recall the vote—I have not looked at it for a good many years—Jackson received 99 votes in the electoral college, John Quincy Adams 84, Crawford 42, and Henry Clay 37. In that group, without question, Henry Clay would have been the choice of the Federalists, who had then gone out of existence. They were then called "National Republicans" as contradistinguished from Republicans, the name given them by Jefferson.

When the election went to the House under the Constitution it resulted in dropping Clay, the one who almost certainly would have been elected had he been third instead of fourth; but the Constitution limited the choice to the three highest. Therefore when the vote came John Quincy Adams was elected over Jackson. That was accomplished largely through the influence of Henry Clay, who threw what influence he had to Adams. That immediately became the basis for a charge of corruption. That charge, largely repeated by John Randolph, of Roanoke, and strongly seconded by Andrew Jackson, made Jackson the dominating figure not only of his own party, which up to that time had not been named, but also of the country generally. By 1828, therefore, there was a sort of break-up of political parties, and the Anti-Masonry Party came on for the first time; and we owe to the Anti-Masonry Party the creation of the nominating convention. The first national convention called for the purpose of naming a candidate was called in 1828 by the Anti-Masonry Party, sometimes called the "Anti-Masonic Party." It was in that year also that the Democrats ceased to be called "Republicans" and took the name "Democrats." The convention system then began, as well as the plan of adopting a platform.

During nearly half a century after 1828 there never was a disputed Presidential election or a failure of the people to elect so that the election would go to the House of Representatives, until the unfortunate occasion of 1876. The reason why there have not been failures to elect a President is our two-party system. It is amazing to note the narrow margin between the two parties from 1828 down to the present time.

In other years, when I was more interested in history than in politics, I made some investigations which afterward took the form of a publication. I desire to give some figures in this connection.

In 1836 Van Buren received a popular majority of but 27 votes out of a total of one and a half million, and an electoral plurality of only 23 votes. A change of 2,000 votes in the State of Pennsylvania would have given the Presidency to Harrison.

In 1844 Polk fell short of a majority of the popular vote by 24,119; that is, Polk received a plurality of the electoral vote but fell short of a majority of the popular vote. His plurality over Clay in the popular vote was only 38,181. His plurality in the electoral vote was 65. In New York Polk's plurality over Clay in the popular vote was 5,106 votes. It will be noted that a change of 2,504 votes in New York would have given that State's electoral vote to Clay, who would have been elected by a plurality of 7 votes in the electoral college.

This perhaps is an explanation why Clay, a frequent candidate for the nomination for the Preidency, said, "I can always be nominated when nobody can be elected, but never nominated when anybody can be elected."

In the State of New York alone in the election of 1844 the Abolitionists cast 15,812 votes. These were principally from the Whig Party. Hence the oft-repeated charge that Clay owed his defeat to the enemies of the Abolition camp who resented his compromise policy. There is little doubt that Clay's defeat was brought about by the third-party movement, and it was quite effective in that it changed the result of an election.

In 1848 General Taylor was elected by an electoral plurality of 36 votes. His popular plurality was 139,555 votes. He fell short of a popular majority by 75,855 votes. He received a plurality, but failed to receive a majority.

In that particular year the Free Soilers cast 291,263 votes. In Pennsylvania alone the Free Soilers cast 11,263 votes. The State of Pennsylvania gave its 26 electoral votes to Taylor. A change in the State of only 6,674 votes would have elected Cass over Taylor.

Mr. President, it is remarkable what a narrow margin there was between the two great political parties in election after election, and what a small number of votes, if in a particular State, would have thrown the election to the other party. It is that narrow margin which prevents the election being thrown into the House of Representatives, and, of course, it is due to the fact that there are two parties instead of many parties.

In 1856 there was what was known as the "Fremont campaign." Buchanan received a plurality of the popular vote of 496,905, but he fell short of a majority by 188,815. His majority in the electoral college was 25 votes. He secured the Pennsylvania electoral vote, 27 in all, by a majority of only 512 votes. His plurality over Fremont in that State was 83,200 votes. Had Pennsylvania gone to Fremont or Fillmore, Buchanan would have lacked 2 electoral votes of the required majority, and he received a majority of only 512 votes, which would indicate that a change of only 256 votes would have thrown the election the other way.

In 1860 the choice was Lincoln. His plurality was 49,295, but he fell short of a majority by 473,645, out of a total vote of 4,680,193. Of an electoral vote of 303, he received 180, which was a majority of 28.

Here, again, is an interesting fact in our electoral system. Lincoln received 1,866,452 votes, which gave him 180 electors in the college. Douglas received 1,375,157 votes, which was nearly 500,000 less than Lincoln, yet he received only 12 electoral votes in the college. Breckinridge received 847,953 votes, a little more than half the Douglas vote, but Breckinridge received 72 electoral votes. In other words, Douglas received double the popular vote Breckinridge received, but he received only 12 electoral votes, while Breckinridge received six times that number. Bell, who received nearly 200,000 votes, less than one fifth the Douglas vote, also received 39 electoral votes in the college, or over three times what Douglas received.

Mr. President, it is the large variation between the popular vote on the one hand and the electoral vote on the other which has led many people to think the system ought to be changed, and a great many people have concluded that it could be cured by eliminating the electoral system, but it cannot be cured by that if we are still to maintain the State as a unit, and I do not believe we will ever be willing to give up using the State as a unit.

Let me give one modern example, which all of us will recall. In the famous Blaine-Cleveland campaign, in 1884, the Prohibition Party was a third party and held the balance of power in the election. In the total vote of over 10,000,000, Cleveland received a plurality of a little over 20,000 but fell short of a majority by over 150,000. In the electoral college he was elected by a majority of 18 votes. He carried the State of New York by a plurality of only 1,149 votes. A change of 575 votes from Cleveland to Blaine in the great State of New York would have made Blaine the President of the United States. In that State the prohibition vote, which came largely from the Blaine ranks, was 25,000. The same thing might be said, though conditions were not quite so glaring, of the election of 1888.

The point is that so long as we maintain the two-party system, where we can affirm on the one hand and deny on the other, we will never or scarcely ever be in danger of having the election taken from the people and thrown into the House of Representatives. But if we shall adopt any plan by which we emasculate the two-party system, then the hazard of a failure on the part of the people to elect will be just as great as it is in Europe.

I was impressed by the statement of the Senator from Michigan in reference to the frequent changes of administration in Europe. It is interesting to note how few times the administration changes in Great Britain as compared with the changes in France. In France the Government will change two or three times in a single year, and I cannot count the times it has changed since the Great War. Within a very short period there were 11 changes. That is not true of Great Britain, because there is a more stable element in control in the British Empire. Still, Britain does have the coalition system, but not like Germany, and not like France. In Germany there are something like 14 parties, and there are about the same number in France.

I desire to give a warning. If we ever abandon the two party system for the coalition-government system now in vogue in Europe, two very serious results will follow. The first will be that we will destroy all party responsibility. There is no such thing as holding any dominating party responsible if it does not have control. That is why I am going to make a statement very frankly here, which is only a repetition of what I stated at the opening of the special session. I think that it is very desirable that one party should have a majority. I complimented the Democratic Party in having a majority in this body of its own membership, without getting a single vote from this side of the aisle, from either me, or anybody else who might not vote as I do.

A party that has a majority is in control and can be held responsible. But suppose the Democrats did not have a majority in this body, and in order to put any measure through, depended upon a fraction of those on this side of the aisle? Would the Democratic Party be responsible? No. Would the Republican Party be responsible? No. The element that held the balance of power would nullify all chance to hold any party responsible. They themselves would not be responsible, because they would not represent anything except independence.

As it is now, I propose to go to the country and hold the Democrats responsible for all the follies which have been committed since the 4th of March 1933, and I can hold them responsible, and they have no alibi. They cannot say the responsibility belongs to a faction of the Republican Party, because they have the votes necessary without calling on any Republican. That is as it ought to be. It gives the American people an opportunity to say to the Democrats, "You have had control, and you are responsible. If you have done what you should have done, we will approve it. If you have done what you should not have done, we will disapprove it." Thus the people will have an opportunity to speak in such a way that the party must feel its responsibility. I say that is fundamental in the United States. We need that, and we need also a strong minority party.

Mr. President, this side of the Chamber has been criticized woefully for not having exercised what some people think is the function of a minority—holding up or resisting legislation which is proposed by the majority party. Of course, I believe there is justification in holding up even a good measure to the point where it is fully discussed, so that if there is any weakness it will be brought out, and if the measure is strong enough it will stand on its own feet and justify its passage.

I do not believe it ought to be the function of a minority party to do nothing but check. I think that is a confession of weakness. But in our Government there is a function of the minority in legislation which we cannot ignore, and that is to take such action as will give the people of the country an opportunity to hold responsible the party which is in the majority. If we embark upon any particular plan which will destroy party responsibility or which will destroy party solidarity, I think it is dangerous; and if this proposal were leading to that I should resist it to the limit of my influence. There is another thing which may grow out of this proposal. If we ever adopt the coalition system which is now in vogue in Europe—which I hope we shall not do, because it would result in a total destruction of party responsibility and of government that can speak only through party—we must then necessarily have that which goes with the responsible ministry, the power of proroguing the Congress, to send the issue to the people, so that the people may vote directly upon the issue upon which the Government divided.

We do not have such a system. If there were any thought of giving to the President the power to dissolve Congress, it would be very offensive, or if it were even in the language of "permitting" him to prorogue Congress it would be very offensive.

If we embark on a plan that will destroy party responsibility, the people will have no way of expressing themselves on any issue. They have now, and will have so long as we maintain the system we now have in vogue; but if we should embark on the other system, they would lose that privilege. Then there would remain the alternative either wholly to give up the chance for the people ever to express themselves, or else to give the power to the President of the United States through an amendment to the Constitution, so that when the Congress should refuse to pass a measure which the President wanted to have enacted he could, as is done in England by the Government, ask that an election be held directly upon that issue through the election of a new Congress. I should not want to go that far, but the two things go together.

When this amendment was first suggested it met with some approval in my mind, because I thought it would get rid of certain things which, in my opinion, we could just as well get rid of; but if the implications which have already been stated concerning the breakdown of party responsibility are likely to be realized, then, in my opinion, it is one of the most dangerous proposals that have come to us for some time.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if no one desires further to discuss this question——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, does the Senator desire to speak on this question?

Mr. COPELAND. No; I desire to make a motion when the discussion of the pending measure shall have been completed.

Mr. NORRIS. I should not like to have this measure set aside by a motion. I shall later ask to have it set aside temporarily by unanimous consent in order to take up the measure which the Senator has in mind.

Mr. COPELAND. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. NORRIS. If no other Senator is going to speak on the joint resolution, I will say a few additional words with reference to it. However, I shall not take the floor if some other Senator desires to speak.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is Senate Joint Resolution 29 the unfinished business, or is it being discussed by common consent?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it was taken up on motion.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the desire of the Senator from Nebraska to have a vote on the joint resolution this afternoon?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is the understanding that we shall not vote on it this afternoon, and that when debate on the subject shall be exhausted this afternoon the measure will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McNARY. I thought the joint resolution was being discussed by common consent. I did not know that the Senator from Nebraska had made a motion to make it the unfinished business.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I might as well now as at some future time say something in regard to the arguments made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I think their fears are absolutely groundless.

I first desire to discuss the objection which both of them made; to wit, that this proposed constitutional amendment is intended to destroy the two-party system.

I have no love for the two-party system. I am not one of those who worship at the shrine of the two-party system, as some Senators do, and do conscientiously. I desire to say, however, that as I see the matter—and I am trying to look at it fairly—there is nothing in the argument of the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Ohio that this amendment will abolish, or will have a tendency to abolish, the two-party system.

I should be for the amendment if it would have that result, even if I did not know what was coming, because I think enough serious criticisms can be made of the management of our two political parties under our present system to justify taking a jump into the dark and trusting to God to get something which is better.

I did not intend to argue the question of the two-party system or party responsibility, because I wished, if possible, to steer this amendment clear of all objection which I think is founded on an argument which has no weight and which can only have a tendency to drive away from the amendment men who are party men, for one cause or another, without stating the real objection, if they have any, to this system.

The only objection I can see is that the amendment is a step toward the abolition of machine rule in any political party. I welcome that. There are, of course, those who favor machine rule. There are those who operate the machine and whose livelihood would be taken away if the machine politician should be put out of business. Naturally they would be opposed to this amendment. Naturally they would not give the real reason for their opposition to it.

I cannot see any possible objection with reference to either party regularity or party responsibility which would result from this amendment being in the Constitution which does not now exist under the present provisions of the Constitution. I am not claiming any virtue for the amendment in that respect. I am simply claiming that these objections have nothing to do with it, and I am urging Senators not to be led astray on this question by rank partisanship which is absolutely foreign to the consideration of this amendment.

It is claimed that in some way the amendment would put our Government on a basis similar to that of England. I cannot see any reason on earth why it should have any tendency in that direction. I should not claim anything for it if it would, though something could be claimed for it. There are some good things about the English system; but I am not advocating that. Some of those who favor this amendment are for the English system and some are against it; but that ought not to divide men upon this proposition.

Do not forget, Senators, that the people of the United States are thinking about this question. Do not forget that the people of the United States are tired of the control of national parties by machinery and political bosses. Do not forget that they know that such control now exists. They have been helpless, to a great extent, to remedy the situation and free themselves from such control. One person argues, "This will not do the work; let us have a law providing for a national primary." I would favor that kind of law, but if we were here now advocating that kind of law some Senator would rise and say, "The proper thing to do is to throw this proposal aside and abolish the electoral college." There is always some avenue of action for men who want to find fault by which they can point to some other method by which to accomplish the same result.

It is said here that the States may pass laws to accomplish the purpose, and that, while they cannot abolish the electoral college they can provide that the names of electors shall not be printed on the ballot and the names of the candidates for President and Vice President shall be printed on the ballot, and electors may subsequently be appointed who will carry out the will of the people. I concede all that. I had something to do probably with the framing of such legislation in the first State that ever put on its statute books a law of that kind. It was not a perfect law; it was a compromise; and a great many improvements could be made in it. In my own State, however, there are no electors until after the election, when the electors are appointed by the Governor. Instead of having electors to cast the vote and one or two of them sent here to bring notice of the result, after meeting in the State capitol and drawing pay for casting that vote, why not have an officer perform that act? Why not let the secretary of state of each State, for instance, certify the result of the election directly by sending it down here? Does anybody find fault with that? What is the use of all the present machinery?

In Nebraska we have as little of that machinery as any State, probably, in the Union. The Governor of the State appoints electors after the election to carry out the will of the people as expressed at the election. Why should the Governor appoint electors of the State and have them meet in the capital and cast their votes and then send one or more of them to Washington to deliver the vote? Why have all that machinery when the people have voted? Why not let the secretary of state of each State write a letter to the Vice President of the United States stating, "Here is the result of the vote"? That would do pretty nearly all that this amendment proposes to do.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It seems to me we could correct the abuse of which the Senator speaks by legislation without amending the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not agree that we could correct the abuse without an amendment to the Constitution. The States could correct it, I concede that, except we would have the machinery for which the Constitution provides. The Constitution directs that Presidential electors shall be appointed—that is the word used—in such manner as the legislatures of the several States shall determine. So the legislatures of the States, if they desired to, could——

Mr. FESS. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. They could do that without regard to any constitutional provision of the State. Under the Constitution of the United States the legislature of every State of the Union could cast the vote in the State for President and Vice President, and we could not prevent any State, even by an amendment to the constitution of that State. from doing that, because that authority is derived from the Constitution of the United States. I ask the Senator to refer to the Constitution to see whether or not I am correct.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator from Nebraska is right.

Mr. NORRIS. The States, however, have not done that. If I wanted to be so unreasonable as I think the Senator from Michigan is in some of the arguments he has made, I could argue that such authority is now in the Constitution. I would be telling the truth. That could be done right now, under our existing Constitution; and if every State did that, went as far as it could in letting its people decide the question, a great deal of the reason for the adoption of this amendment would disappear. I frankly concede that. However, the States will not do it.

The Constitution originally provided that the United States Senators should be elected by the legislatures of the States. A campaign was conducted for many years to give the people of the States the right to vote directly for Members of the United States Senate, but we got nowhere. Finally, in Oregon a law was enacted providing that every candidate for the legislature should have the right to print on the official ballot the number of a certain pledge—pledge no. 1 or 2 or 3—which, if elected, he agreed he would carry out. When the law was looked up, and those pledges were seen, all the people knew what each meant.

The first one was—I think it was the first one—that the candidate, if elected to the State legislature, would, when the question of the election of United States Senator came before the legislature, vote for the candidate who had received the highest number of votes at the preceding election. If he had signed that pledge, the statement that he had signed pledge no. 1 was printed on the official ballot, and every citizen of the State when he cast his vote could say, "Here is a candidate for State senator who has agreed to abide by our election of a Senator to the United States Senate."

No. 2 pledge was, "While I will not be bound absolutely by the pledge, I will give it consideration."

Pledge no. 3 was, "I will not pay any attention to it."

When one became a candidate for the legislature in the State of Oregon he could sign any one of those three pledges, or he did not need to do so. The result was that practically every candidate of every party signed pledge no. 1. Such pledges so made resulted in the election of Members of the Senate in reality by a direct vote of the people. Candidates for the United States Senate in the State of Oregon ran on the ticket the same as candidates for Governor or for any other office, although carrying the election did not put the successful candidate for the Senate into office; the election still remained with the legislature; but a majority of the legislature, practically all of its members, signed a pledge to follow the result of the general election, and the consequence was that the man who carried the State for Senator was elected by the legislature regardless of his party affiliations. That was known as "the Oregon system."

When that system was put into force and effect a number of other States adopted it. When it came to voting here on a constitutional amendment proposing to give the people the right to elect Senators it could well have been said, "See what they are doing in Oregon; we do not need this amendment; let the States pass the necessary laws."

The first time I was elected to this body I was elected under a law copied after that which brought about the so-called "Oregon system." The members of the legislature in my State, with one or two exceptions, had signed pledge no. 1, the candidates for Senator having been nominated at the primary election. I was nominated by one party and my opponent was nominated by another party. We canvassed the State just as though the result meant that it would give the successful candidate title to a seat here in the Senate, although it was nothing in the world but an instruction to the legislature which every member could follow at his will. I was elected by the legislature following that election, a legislature, Mr. President, that was by a strong majority opposed to me politically. They voted for me because they had pledged the people of the State that they would vote for the people's choice at the election, and I happened to carry the election.

That was a round-about way of electing Senators by direct vote of the people. The people had been for a constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of Senators for years and years, but the politicians prevented them from getting it. After quite a large number of States had gone that far we finally got an amendment to the United States Constitution providing for the direct election of Senators, but not for many years, and not until practically all the people demanded it. All kinds of excuses were then made, such as are being made now for refusing to adopt the pending amendment. It is said, "You must do it in some other way." To some extent that is so, but I want to say to you, Mr. President, that, although this proposal has not been embodied in platforms made by machines and bosses, the people of the United States know what is pending at this minute before the Senate.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish the thought which I have just started, and then I shall be glad to yield. In the last Presidential campaign I spoke; beginning in Philadelphia and winding up the day before election at Long Beach, Calif., I went clear across the continent. I had prepared some of the speeches I was going to deliver, and in one of them I made a statement to the effect that prior to the expiration of the term of office of the President who would be chosen at that election we would have passed on a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States to abolish the electoral college. I said, in speaking in behalf of the candidate I was supporting, that in my judgment such action would be taken within the next 4 years. I did not have any sinister motive in saying that. I do not know just why I said it, but I said it, and the first time I said it I was dumbfounded at the response I got from the audience. I did not think there was anything particular in the statement that called for approbation or applause, and yet the audience rose to its feet and the statement was met with deafening applause.

I commenced to think about it. I wondered if the people did know about the proposed abolition of the electoral college. No party had mentioned it in its platform. As a matter of curiosity and to test the sentiment, I repeated the statement at another place in another speech, and with the same result. I tried it again and again, and I never failed to get the same response, indicating clearly that the people knew what it was all about.

Yes, Senators, the people are thinking. They know that the electoral college is out of date. They know that back behind it all the only interests which demand its preservation are the machines and the bosses. They know national conventions have been controlled by machines and bosses, and they have had to go to the polls, absolutely helpless, to choose between two evils. They have had no choice in the selection of the Chief Magistrate of the country. They want a voice in that choice. They want a fair opportunity to let their influence be felt. They know the electoral college stands like a wall in the way.

I yield now to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator said a moment ago that the only change to be effected by his amendment would be to do away with the electoral college. I assume he did not mean exactly that?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I meant it would be practically the only change.

Mr. HEBERT. Of course, the joint resolution provides for a method of electing a President and by 35 percent of the vote cast in the election.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. HEBERT. As to a choice of the candidate for President and the candidate for Vice President, is not that done through the primary system in those States where there is a law providing for primaries?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HEBERT. Are not the candidates for Presidential electors chosen at the primaries, and may not anybody participate in those primaries?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. HEBERT. I realize that in those States which have the convention system that is not so; but in the Senator's own State, where there is an open primary system, may not anybody participate in the primary and express his choice for a Presidential elector?

Mr. NORRIS. No; they cannot do that. There are no Presidential electors there.

Mr. HEBERT. Then the condition is different in the Senator's State than in most other States.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is probably the only State in the Union which has that kind of law.

Mr. HEBERT. Let us assume that the State does use the Presidential-elector system——

Mr. NORRIS. In order that I may not be misunderstood, let me say this: I made the assertion that there are no Presidential electors. Let me modify that by saying there are no Presidential electors at the time of the general election. Of course, the Constitution of the United States requires Presidential electors, and after the election they are appointed by the Governor of the State.

Mr. HEBERT. Then, in the Senator's own State there is no question of Presidential electors involved?

Mr. NORRIS. No; not to any great extent.

Mr. HEBERT. The proposed amendment to the Constitution would not add anything to that which now exists?

Mr. NORRIS. It would add a little, though I admit it would be little, because we have accomplished something as we did in the election of Senators. We have accomplished indirectly what we could not accomplish directly.

Mr. HEBERT. Assuming that Presidential electors are done away with by the amendment, what is to prevent a continuance of the practices which now obtain in those States where there is a primary? In other words, may they not proceed just as they proceed now to choose candidates for President and Vice President?

Mr. NORRIS. The States do not choose candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency.

Mr. HEBERT. Cannot they do it?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. HEBERT. I understand they can.

Mr. NORRIS. The States choose delegates to national conventions. Does the Senator mean after the candidates have been nominated?

Mr. HEBERT. It does not make any difference whether half a dozen parties have nominated candidates, as I understand the Constitution. It is always within the power of the State to choose the Presidential electors, and those electors can cast their votes for anyone.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. HEBERT. So the Senator's amendment would not effect any change in that respect.

Mr. NORRIS. If my amendment were adopted, there would not be any such thing as Presidential electors. They would be entirely abolished.

Mr. HEBERT. There must be some machinery to bring about the nomination of candidates.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. It would take a letter and a 2-cent stamp. They would take the place of a lot of machinery and men to meet at the Capital to be sent down here and have a big time when they bring the votes down to Washington.

Mr. HEBERT. That is not the way it is done now even in the Senator's own State. One cannot become a candidate in that way—by the use of a 2-cent stamp and a letter.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not say so.

Mr. HEBERT. He must comply with certain formalities provided by law.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. We have the electoral college. A 2-cent stamp and letter will not do it. When the election is over and we want to bring the vote down here to be counted, a delegation is sent along to bring the vote to Washington. When the electors are appointed, they meet at the State capitol, and they solemnly cast their votes for somebody for President and for Vice President.

Mr. HEBERT. I was not directing my remarks to that situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. HEBERT. I had reference to a choice of candidates for President and Vice President in the several States. It is my understanding, as I read the Constitution, that one may vote for anyone for President or Vice President provided he conforms to the laws of the State where he votes.

Mr. NORRIS. He has to vote for a Presidential elector ordinarily.

Mr. HEBERT. Of course there is a Presidential elector; but suppose the provision as to Presidential electors were removed from the Constitution, the voter would still have formalities to comply with similar to those under the existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. He would not have any new responsibility. He would have to go through the formality of voting.

Mr. HEBERT. And, also, as I understand, the formality of making nominations.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HEBERT. In that respect there would not be any difference except that we would eliminate the Presidential elector, but the same formalities would be required.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment does not intend or propose to eliminate conventions, nominating conventions, primaries, or anything of the kind. It has nothing to do with them.

Mr. HEBERT. That is the point I had in mind. That is why I made the inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish now to say something along that line. It has a bearing on the two-party system about which we have been hearing so much. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States about a political party. Where is the authority for a two-party system? It is not in the Constitution of the United States. There is not a word there about it. Very seldom will anyone find a reference to a political party even in a statute, unless it is a statute involving some regulation whereby it is desired to control certain wrongful activities sometimes employed by political parties. Political parties are not mentioned in the law. The two-party system exists now in spite of the law and in spite of the Constitution. The Constitution does not authorize it, neither does it prohibit it. It has nothing to do with it.

I suppose there is not a State convention in existence which makes direct reference, or perhaps any reference at all, to a political party. That is something outside the law. That is the reason why national conventions can be and are controlled by special interests. We know it; and let us not forget that the people of the United States right down to the grass roots know it, too. They have seen it happen. They have seen men in several Presidential campaigns leave their party in condemnation of the control of the party by special interests, regardless of law, without any law except what these interests themselves make.

Mr. President, the control of national conventions is no secret. Every man, woman, and child in the United States knows how they are handled. Nobody is deceived by the idea that John Jones or Dick Smith, from Kansas or Nebraska, who is going to Chicago or New York to help nominate a President really has anything to do with the convention. They do not even believe it themselves. I admit that many people believe in the control of government absolutely by party, and some do not. I think one of the silliest things in our body politic is the idea that we ought to hold one party absolutely responsible for all legislation, and that all members of any other party ought to fight the dominant party and vote against it on all occasions.

Let Senators look over the roll calls of the United States Senate and see how many times the vote on the roll call has been divided by party lines. Not one time in a thousand will that be found to have been the case. I do not believe it has happened during the past 2 years, except on one occasion, in the United States Senate. Nobody claims now—at least, I do not know of anybody who does—that it is the duty of a Republican Member of the Senate to vote against anything that a Democratic Member proposes, or that the Democratic Party proposes; and yet that is what party responsibility, carried to its logical end, means. It means more than that if we are logical, and there is one respect in which it would be a great thing. It would give us a short ballot with a vengeance.

If we were carrying out absolutely the doctrine of the responsibility of parties at every election, we ought to have no man's name printed on the ballot. We ought merely to have printed on the ballot "Democratic Party", "Republican Party", and perhaps some other party, "Labor Party", "Socialist Party." When the voter would go into the booth, he would see those names, and he would vote for one party or the other, and that vote would be canvassed. If the Democratic Party won nationally, it would call on Jim Farley to name all the officers of the Federal Government. If the Republican Party won, probably the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] would name them, or perhaps Herbert Hoover would name them, and it would be all over.

That is party responsibility.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Who would name the officers if the Progressive Party should win? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, as I understand, the Progressive Party—although I am not a member of it—does not believe in that kind of a system, and I do not believe in it. I think it is my duty as a Senator to follow the dictates of my conscience, and I try to do so. Notwithstanding the fact that a legislative proposal may come from the Democratic Party, if I think it is right I support it; but if I were thinking of responsibility, I should say, "That is your job and not mine; I will get out from under." If a Senator on this side proposes something that I think is right, I consider it my duty to vote for it, and I try to do so.

That is my political philosophy. I think that is the progressive political philosophy. We do not adhere to the old theory under which a man gets in a rut and stays there because his father was there, because his grandfather was there, and gets deeper and deeper in the rut until he sees the sun only at noontime, and then only for a short glimpse. He is in a rut, and he stays there. He becomes narrow-minded. He can sleep all night on the narrow edge of a 2 by 4 and like it. [Laughter.] That is his belief. He has a right to it. I am not finding fault with him, except that I think in the progress of human events he is so far behind the procession that he cannot be seen at all.

Mr. President, that is the logical result of party responsibility. I take it that the Republican Senators who voted for a great many of the measures proposed by the Democratic administration will not apologize for their action when they go home and meet their constituents. They will say, "We thought the measures were right, so we voted for them"; and if they do, they will be right. That is the thing to do. I commend them for it.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. What has the Senator to say about Presidential responsibility instead of party responsibility? In other words, is it not the proper thing for a President to appoint men to carry out his policies who believed in those policies before he was elected?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. DILL. Then how can there be nonpartisanship in all Presidential appointments?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I believe I agree more thoroughly with the principles advocated by Mr. Roosevelt than 90 percent of the Democratic job hunters who supported him and claimed to have elected him; and yet, if President Roosevelt should appoint me to an office, there are about a million Democrats who would at once go up in the air and have a fever [laughter] and say, "It is party responsibility! He ought to be a Democrat."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I think there would be about 25,000,000 more who would commend the President; but that is not what I am trying to ascertain. I desire to ascertain the Senator's viewpoint on this question: When a man is elected President, is it not his duty to himself, and to the country, and to the people who elected him, to select men to carry out his policies—I do not care whether they come from his party or not—who believed in him and fought for him and helped elect him, regardless of party, rather than to pick men who were opposed to him and fought him until he was in, and then got on the band wagon?

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator 100 percent. I think that is true. That statement must be applied, however, to officers who have something to do with policies.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not apply to a stenographer or some employee of that kind; but I think the Senator is perfectly right. I want to commend him for his statement. I did not understand him when he first put his question to me, but I agree fully with what he says.

Mr. President, at present we have national conventions not provided for by the Constitution, and they are supreme. Did that ever occur to Senators? Under existing conditions the national conventions are supreme nine times out of ten. Once in a while there are revolutions in both political parties in which the people have their say and get what they want. I admit that; but I am speaking of general conditions. Generally, that is not true. A few men control.

It is well known that a man on a sick-bed in Philadelphia controlled a great national convention in Chicago. He told them when to make the deal, and what deal to make, and whom they should nominate for President of the United States. I concede that a good man might be selected under those conditions, but it is a long way from a democracy when a thing like that is done. That, however, is what we have under our national convention system.

The only thing I claim for the pending constitutional amendment is that it will lessen such influence in national conventions, because it will make it easier to overthrow national conventions when they have finished their work. It is practically impossible now to do so. In theory it can be done, but practically it cannot be done. It never has been possible to do it. Sometimes it has almost been done, but in practice the national conventions make our laws and select our Presidents. That is a sad admission to make in a democracy.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. That becomes doubly objectionable if we remember that the national conventions exist without any authority of law, and were never contemplated under the Constitution of the United States, but are simply a make-shift method of evading the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true. That is very well put. I thank the Senator. Outside the Constitution, outside the law, there is a force that controls the highest office in the land more frequently than it fails to control it.

This amendment would not cure that condition entirely. I do not claim that for the amendment; but it would lessen it very materially. It would not bring about the party condition that exists in Great Britain, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has indicated. I do not see that it would have any tendency to do that. It would not have a tendency to bring about multiplicity of parties. It would purify existing parties; that is all. When the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] grows so eloquent in expressing his fear that a large number of partisan blocs would come about if this amendment should become part of the Constitution, he forgets that the reform it would bring about would be the purification of the parties that now exist in our country. It would make them better; and every honest man ought to be glad to have that happen. It would make them more careful. It would lessen the influence of men who, behind the scenes, furnish the money to build up the machine, with the expectation and the intention of getting a return from it in the way of favored legislation.

If anyone desires to appeal from a national convention, where can he go? Nowhere. He is at the end of the road if both national conventions are controlled. Everyone who participated in the last Presidential election knows that one of the reasons for the great majority which President Roosevelt received was not so much a desire to elect President Roosevelt as it was a desire to defeat the opposition to President Roosevelt. He received many votes, and I think he was entitled to them, because he merited them on his own standing as a man; but millions of the votes came to him not because the voters loved him but because they disliked the other candidate.

Mr. President, the blocs which the Senator from Michigan has criticized came about because of a feeling of revulsion against the party in power and the other party because they were not doing their duty; because they were not doing what they had pledged the people of the United States they would do.

We have had different blocs here without regard to party lines. The farm bloc, for instance, was organized a good many years ago, but since I have been in the Senate. Both Republicans and Democrats were in it. Why was that bloc organized? Was there something selfish they wanted? No. Were they candidates? No. Were they working for a particular candidate for office. No. They were simply trying to impress Congress with the fact that the pledges the parties had made to the people should be kept. They were condemned, it is true, and are condemned today by the Senator from Michigan; are laughed at. All kinds of fun was poked at them at the time, but they were moved by the purest motives, honest motives, conscientious motives.

This amendment would not affect that situation at all. There could be such blocs under this amendment, but there would not be any more under the amendment than there are now. Blocs and organizations of that kind, small in number many times, arise on account of some dissatisfaction of the people. Nine times out of ten they come into existence because the people's elected representatives have failed to carry out the pledges they made to the people.

The amendment would put the people of the United States closer to their Chief Executive. It would take away all the machinery of the electoral college, which now is perfectly useless. It would tend to purify the existing parties, and it would not result in an extra party. If anything comes of that particular point, it will be where the political parties disregard the will and the rights of the people when they hold their national conventions. National conventions then will not be supreme. There will still be a court to which to appeal, and that will be the people of the United States, at the ballot box.

Do we not want to give them that right? Are we going to say that when the Republican Party and the Democratic Party meet and nominate candidates for President, the doors are closed? Are we going to say that nobody can run for President except one who is nominated in the conventions? So far as practical matters are concerned, that is the situation right now. This will make it possible, where the people have been deceived in the national conventions, for an appeal to be taken from the national conventions to the people themselves.

The Senator says it will be easier to get on the ballot. That is true. It will not be any easier for candidates for President to get on the ballot than a candidate for Governor to get on the ballot. It will not be any easier for a candidate for President to get on a ballot than it will be for a candidate for attorney general or State superintendent to get on the ballot.

Why not make it as easy for one as for the other? Why should we say that in a particular State, in order to put a man on the ballot as a candidate for Governor, 5,000 signatures will be required, but if one is running for President in the same State, with the same people voting at the same election, 100,000 signatures will be required? Why make a difference? Are the people in a State not interested in the President of the United States, as well as in the Governor of the State? This will make possible what now is practically impossible, namely, running as an independent for President of the United States.

As to throwing the election into the Congress, I do not believe there is anything in the argument that that would result oftener than under the present provisions. The Senator from Michigan gets red in the face arguing against the 35-percent provision, and in the next breath—not the next breath, either, but as soon as the redness disappears and he has time to get red again—he gets red in the face because he says, any percentage would be wrong. He then argues that 35 percent is the savior of the situation.

I do not care anything about that particular percentage. As I have said before, I think 35 percent is enough; but if a goodly number of the Senate does not believe that 35 percent is enough, I want to vote to take it out. It is not fundamental, and I do not want to see this proposal harmed or defeated by something of that kind.

Where there is a tie, so that there would be four or five candidates from whom the House would have to select, the present constitutional provision is that they must select from three, making it impossible for them to perform their constitutional duty. There is a provision in the proposed amendment which would relieve that situation. But Senators who are opposed to the joint resolution argue against that, and argue that that should be stricken out.

We are now under a handicap. If the election at the very next Presidential election should be thrown into the House of Representatives, and two receiving the highest number of votes were tied, and two receiving the next highest were tied, the House of Representatives could not perform its constitutional functions. It would be up against an impossibility.

The proposed amendment would relieve that situation. If there were a tie, the election would have to be one of three; but if the number, on account of ties, were increased to four or five, the number from which the selection must be made would have to be increased.

The object of the 35-percent provision is, principally, to keep elections from going into the House of Representatives and into the Senate. We wanted to avoid that if we could. That may be a good thing, or a bad thing. We thought it was a good thing to keep it out of Congress as much as we could. There is nothing sacred about it whatever. If 35 percent is not right, make it 45, or abolish the provision altogether. I think the Senate ought to have an opportunity to express itself on that question, and I should welcome such opportunity.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said by others, and now is to be said by me, about party responsibility and party regularity. I regret that that question has come into the discussion. Senators who know me know that I am not much of a believer in party regularity. I concede to the man who believes in party regularity and party responsibility the same right to his belief that I have to mine, the same right to follow his conscientious conviction.

I would not have brought this matter into the debate. I did not do so to begin with; but it has been brought in by the Senator from Michigan. I do not think it has any place here. Party responsibility has nothing to do with the proposed amendment. I regret that Senators are taking advantage of the fact that if they can incur party resentment, they can go a good way toward defeating the amendment. I admit that, and that is the reason why I wanted to keep this question out. It has no place here.

I have read several articles in newspapers running along the same line. One article I read at one time, referring to the original provision we had here, in which we had proportional voting provided for, stated, "The South will never agree to that. The Democratic Party will not stand for that." Within a week I read an article circulated by the Associated Press to the effect that this measure was a Democratic measure, and that Republicans were learning to resent it, that they were finding out that after all this was meant for the injury of the Republican Party. There is absolutely nothing to it. I do not know whether this report and the arguments made here are actuated by the feeling that there is something wrong, or whether it is believed that there is truth in the statement; but certainly, so far as I know, there is not any partisanship in this proposal. What the Democratic Party of the South would oppose probably would be opposed by the Republican Party of Vermont, and even that of Michigan, the Senator's own State.

Mr. President, under an understanding had with several Senators who wish to prepare amendments, and who probably cannot complete them this afternoon, if no other Senator desires to speak on this subject at this time, I ask that the joint resolution be temporarily laid aside, to be taken up tomorrow. I shall not make the request, however, if someone else wishes to speak now.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have no desire whatever to object to the request of the Senator from Nebraska; but I understood that there was a distinct understanding that the tariff bill should be taken up tomorrow morning at the beginning of the session of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Nebraska is that the joint resolution be temporarily laid aside and that the bill of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] be taken up.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to that arrangement. I think it should be understood, however, that tomorrow it is expected that the tariff bill shall be taken up.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not want to put off the joint resolution indefinitely. We could continue debating it today, if the Senators who have indicated a desire to present amendments were here with their amendments. It is not on my account that I am asking that the joint resolution be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that. I assure the Senator from Nebraska that I shall cooperate with him in an effort to secure an arrangement to bring this matter to a conclusion at a very early date.

Mr. NORRIS. I should hate to let the joint resolution go over with the understanding that its further consideration must wait until the debate on the tariff bill shall have been completed. I do not know how long that bill will take.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it entirely probable that during the consideration of the tariff bill we shall be able to resume consideration of the joint resolution of the Senator from Nebraska. I hardly think the Senate would be prepared to conclude this subject tomorrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it would take long.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in conference with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], it was tentatively agreed to begin the consideration of the tariff bill tomorrow, Thursday, at 12 o'clock. In the meantime, the unfinished business will be the joint resolution of the Senator from Nebraska. I understand that the Senator from New York desires to discuss Senate bill 2800, the modification of the Pure Food and Drugs Act. So far as the Members on this side of the Chamber are concerned, I think I can speak for them and say that if it fits into the situation better for the Senator from Nebraska to continue with his joint resolution and have a vote tomorrow, with the understanding that the Senator from New York shall then follow with his bill, we should be willing to take up the tariff bill Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President; I could not agree to such an arrangement.

Mr. McNARY. I am not asking for it. I am merely making the suggestion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to make a suggestion which I think will be acceptable to the Senator from Nebraska, that we make the joint resolution which is now the unfinished business the special order for next Monday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if that is agreeable to the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Arkansas, I shall agree to it, although I did want to dispose of the joint resolution; but one Senator has left the Chamber and is working on an amendment which he wishes to offer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There are two or three Senators who said they had not determined finally what they proposed to do with reference to the joint resolution, and they asked that it go over.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; they want some time for consideration. I realize that it is late in the session. This amendment, if it is to be submitted to the legislatures, must receive the approval of the House of Representatives. I do not want to be in the attitude of trying to hurry it at all. I want the fullest consideration, and I desire to have everybody fully informed on it. I will agree, however, if that is agreeable to other Senators, that the joint resolution shall be made the special order for next Monday at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is at this time to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, and to make it the special order of business next Monday at 12 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. With the understanding that at that time we shall dispose of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall favor disposing of it then.

Mr. McNARY. That means following the arguments and the discussions, which will be logical.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. There will be an unlimited debate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall expect the joint resolution to be disposed of. I do not think we are in a position to agree on a time for a vote.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not ask for an agreement as to time. I want every Senator to debate the measure who desires to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

MUNICIPAL-DEBT ADJUSTMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. NEELY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: On page 2, line 13, of the Senate amendment, after "irrigation", insert "reclamation"; on page 3, line 5, of the Senate amendment strike out "51 per centum" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "30 per centum in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts and owning not less than 51 per centum in the case of all other taxing districts"; and on page 9, line 18, of the Senate amendment strike out "75 percent" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "66⅔ per centum in the case of drainage, irrigation, reclamation, and levee districts and creditors holding 75 per centum in the case of all other taxing districts"; and the Senate agree to the same.

M. M. NEELY,
PAT. MCCARRAN,
WARREN R. AUSTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HATTON W. SUMNERS,
A. J. MONTAGUE,
TOM D. MCKEOWN,
RANDOLPH PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NEELY. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from West Virginia should make a very brief statement concerning the conference report. I am not familiar with it and do not recall the legislation when it was here in the Senate.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, subject to two or three slight changes, the conferees have agreed to the Senate amendments to the House bill——

Mr. McNARY. I recall now the nature of the legislation and have no objection.

The report was agreed to.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC IN FOOD AND DRUGS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2800, to prevent the manufacture, shipment, and sale of adulterated or misbranded food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics, and to regulate traffic therein; to prevent the false advertisement of food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics; and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Dickinson	Hayden	O'Mahoney
Bachman	Duffy	Hebert	Overton
Bailey	Erickson	Lewis	Patterson
Bankhead	Fess	Logan	Pope
Barkley	Fletcher	Lonergan	Robinson, Ark.
Black	Frazier	McGill	Robinson, Ind.
Brown	George	McKellar	Schall
Byrnes	Gibson	McNary	Steiwer
Clark	Glass	Metcalf	Tydings
Connally	Goldsborough	Murphy	Vandenberg
Copeland	Hale	Neely	Walsh
Couzens	Hastings	Norris
Davis	Hatch	Nye

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of my colleague the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], who are all detained on official business.

I regret to announce the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], caused by continued illness.

I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. I renew my request for unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2800, being the so-called "food and drugs bill."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill, and I will have to ask the Senator from New York to move that its consideration be proceeded with.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well; I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2800.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York if it is his purpose seriously to undertake to pass this very important bill at this session, or does he desire merely to take it up and make a speech on it?

Mr. COPELAND. I may answer the Senator by saying that it is not my desire merely to take the bill up and make a speech on it. I have a very intense desire to have it enacted into law at this session.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe that the Senator is going to be able to get a vote on the bill, from what I know of the opposition to it.

Mr. COPELAND. If that should happen it would not be the first disappointment I have had in my life.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLARK. If the unfinished business, being the joint resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] proposing a constitutional amendment, which has been temporarily laid aside——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No. The joint resolution of the Senator from Nebraska was made a special order for next Monday at 12 o'clock, and it is expected that tomorrow, when the Senate shall meet, it will proceed to the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that. My parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President, goes to the question of whether or not the measure proposed by the Senator from New York is being given any privileged status by the adoption of his motion. In other words, I do not think anyone has any disposition to object to some consideration being given to this bill, but if it is the purpose of the Senator from New York to take and hold the floor and push this measure to a vote, then some of us will desire to debate the question of consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I can answer the question. If the bill shall now be proceeded with, it will be the unfinished business when we recess this evening. If tomorrow the tariff bill shall be taken up, it must be either by unanimous consent or by motion, which, if adopted, would result in the tariff bill superseding the bill of the Senator from New York, if unanimous consent were not given to lay the latter bill aside.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the bill of the Senator from New York were taken up this afternoon and displaced tomorrow, after tomorrow would it have any better position than it would have if we should take it up this afternoon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Not if it were displaced on motion.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I understand, the motion now pending is to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2800?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question before the Senate. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. COPELAND. I will ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is called for.

The Senate proceeded to divide.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think we ought to know what the attitude of Senators is on a measure so important to the public health, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULKLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is absent from the city on official business. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). I inquire if the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. McNARY. I have a pair with that Senator. In view of the situation and the absence of that Senator I must withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. I am not informed how he would vote, and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], and let my vote stand.

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] to my colleague the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to reannounce the absences of Senators heretofore announced and for the reasons then given.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent from the Senate attending a conference at the White House.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is attending a session of the Labor Board.

I also announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are absent on official business.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY];

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] with the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THOMPSON];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The roll call resulted—yeas 26, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—26

Barkley	Couzens	Erickson	George
Black	Davis	Fletcher	Gibson
Copeland	Duffy	Frazier	Hatch

Hayden	Lonergan	Overton	Walsh
Hebert	Neely	Robinson, Ark.	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this vote the yeas are 26 and the nays are 22. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] have announced their pairs. A quorum is present. The motion is agreed to.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 2800) to prevent the manufacture, shipment, and sale of adulterated or misbranded food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics, and to regulate traffic therein; to prevent the false advertisement of food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics; and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce, with amendments.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I judge from the interest taken in the vote that the bill is understood by the Senate or at least Senators think they understand it. As a matter of fact, propaganda put out against the food and drug bill is propaganda founded upon the opposition to the first bill, known as S. 1944. The bill which we have before us is the third revision of that bill. The bill which is now pending has almost no relationship to the bill which has met such violent opposition throughout the country.

I beg Senators to believe me when I say this. In the interest of the public welfare and of the public health, before they determine to cast their votes against the passage of the measure, I ask that each Senator shall take the pains to ascertain for himself exactly what is contained in the bill. I am frank to say there has been manifested here today a degree of opposition which indicates difficulty in passing the bill at this late day in the session.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the bill contains provisions which would justify it being known as the "Tugwell bill", against which we have received so many telegrams and letters?

Mr. COPELAND. The bill to which I referred, known as "Senate bill 1944", which has been revised three or four times since its introduction, is known to the public as the "Tugwell bill."

Mr. LEWIS. But not the present bill?

Mr. COPELAND. It is not the Tugwell bill which is now before the Senate. I have had ambition indeed that it might sometime be called the "Copeland bill."

Mr. LEWIS. If it is a good bill, it should be known as the "Copeland bill." If it is a bad bill, of course, it may be called the "Tugwell bill." [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. As a matter of fact, the first bill was prepared by various authorities and experts and the permanent employees of the Department; and the Tugwell bill, bad as its reputation is, in my opinion, does not deserve the bad name it has. However, that bill is not under consideration.

Mr. President, I am anxious on behalf of the committee to perfect the bill, so that, even though we may not come to the point of passing it, the bill may be in such form that some future and perhaps wiser Congress may see fit to enact it. Therefore, I ask that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments which are indicated in the bill, and those which will be presented by me as coming from the committee.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, before that is done I suggest to the Senator, who is familiar with his bill, that some historical account should be given of the progress of the bill through the committees. There is an impression among a number of Members of the Senate that this is the so-called "Tugwell bill", to which almost universal objection has been offered. The Senator will recall that a subcommittee considered that bill to final disposition. Efforts were made to correct two bills, at least, by the author of the measure now under consideration, the Senator from New York.

Before we commence the consideration of the committee amendments, I think the Senator should point out the circumstances attending the framing of the first bill, and the efforts which were made to modify and improve it, so that the Members of the Senate may have some knowledge of the structure of the present measure. I make that suggestion only in the interest of bringing the matter more clearly and logically to the attention of the Members of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I always yield to suggestions made by my friend the Senator from Oregon. Let me say, therefore, that last June, at the request of the administration, I introduced the bill which became known as the "Tugwell bill", Senate bill 1944. I am frank to say that I never read it until October; but when I did read the bill there came to my own mind many, and I think most, of the criticisms which afterward were violently stressed by other students of the measure.

Therefore, the subcommittee to which the bill was referred, consisting of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], and the Senator from New York, myself, had extended hearings on this bill on several days in the early part of December. It became apparent at that time that it was necessary violently—I think I may use that word—to revise the original bill. As a matter of fact, the original bill was very radically changed and reported to the Committee on Commerce, where it was given consideration. It was determined by the committee that it would be wise to have another hearing on a reprinted bill. I introduced it, and the new bill, S. 2000, was given a hearing by the full committee; and for a number of days—for nearly a week, as I recall it. Then sessions of the full Committee on Commerce gave study to the bill and heard witnesses representing every phase of thought in the various industries affected. The committee heard various citizens who were interested, including a number of women, who were and are greatly interested; for I assure Senators that from the time of the fight under Dr. Wiley in the old days in 1906, when the original bill was passed, there has never been a let-up in the interest which the women of the country have taken in matters having to do with pure food and drugs. So they were heard.

Out of that series of hearings came this further bill, Senate bill 2800, the measure now before us. I may say regarding this latest bill that there has not been a day since its introduction on the 15th of March when I have not been personally in conversation and discussion and debate with persons interested in further changes in the measure. No longer ago than this very morning there was a conference with the apple growers regarding certain provisions of the bill.

So I desire to make it as clear as words possibly can make it that the measure we have before us is not the bill upon which the attacks have been made. It is a different measure; and, in my opinion, there are at least 25 reasons which I could enumerate, if the demand were made, why this bill should be enacted into law.

This bill is intended to safeguard the men and women, the boys and girls, and the babies of this country. When Congress passed the law of 1906, which was the first attempt in the world to establish standards of foods and drugs, the food industry was of small consequence. It amounted to very little outside of the traffic in fresh fruits and vegetables. Since that time the fabrication of foods has become one of the greatest industries of our country. In every part of the country there are manufactures of various forms of foodstuffs.

During the past few years there has been a tremendous growth in the manufacture and sale of cosmetics. Cosmetics have been used from the beginning of time. I see a smile upon the face of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. He, no doubt, has been a profound student in the fields involved here; but from the beginning of time women have found ways to beautify themselves, and men have, too. From the ancient tombs have come evidences in lipstick and powder and salve that the ancients sought to enhance their beauty; but, Mr. President, there has grown up in this country a dangerous use of a few cosmetics, and I desire to show the Senate one reason why we have emphasized, in the formulation of this bill, the chapter devoted to cosmetics.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand the photograph of a beautiful young woman, and I submit it to the Senator from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEELY. I object.

Mr. LEWIS. I object to these expressions of envy on the part of eminent Senators.

Mr. NEELY. Not envy, but fear of the suspension of proper senatorial activities prompted my objection.

Mr. COPELAND. I will give it to the Senate, then, so that there may be no feeling of discrimination.

Mr. LEWIS. I pass it now to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], after I pass it to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT].

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEELY. Before the Senator succeeds in absorbing the entire attention of the Senate in the photographs of the beautiful girl to whom he has referred, let me inquire if his bill contains an inhibition against the excessive use of the abominable lipstick, to which he referred a moment ago?

Mr. COPELAND. No; I am glad to say there is not.

Mr. NEELY. I should be very much more enthusiastic about the bill if it contained such provision. The excessive use of lipstick has greatly increased the world's troubles. Lipstick is not healthful for women. It is not safe for men. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator wish to testify on the subject at any great length? [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator is objecting to the exhibits which have caused trouble.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this picture is a picture of a young lady who, because of some civic activity in her home city in Ohio, was given a dinner by the citizens. In preparing herself, as she properly should for an occasion so important to her, she used a preparation upon her eyelashes. That preparation unfortunately contained a poison. Two weeks after the dinner the result was what is shown in this second photograph—eyes destroyed; sight gone, and gone forever.

Mr. President, Senators may have had letters from certain cosmetic manufacturers asking that the bill be so drawn that only those cosmetics which contain substances harmful to the occasional person shall be prohibited; that the wording shall be such as to permit the sale of those that are not harmful to the average person.

Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to conserve life and health.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. Referring to the differences between the original bill and the pending bill, I should like to ask whether the redraft or new bill gives the right of court review to the offended person.

Mr. COPELAND. It does.

Mr. WALCOTT. The original bill did not.

Mr. COPELAND. No; the original bill did not. Let me answer the Senator's question in a moment, because I desire to finish what I was saying about the other subject.

An effort has been made to have the bill changed so that the sale of a cosmetic should be permitted if it was not harmful to the average user. We were unwilling to permit that change because it was not the average user who suffered blindness; it was this unfortunate young woman who happened to be susceptible to the poison contained in the cosmetic, and by reason of the use of it lost her eyes, and her sight is forever lost.

Mr. President, let me say, now, in reply to the question asked by the Senator from Connecticut, that the first bill, Senate bill 1944, would have given tremendous and conclusive powers to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture could have sat down by himself and decided on this, that, or the other thing, and formulated a regulation that one should or should not have done this or that. There was no provision for review except such as might come under the common law; there was no direct provision made for review. But the bill which we are now considering and which comes under the criticism of hundreds of persons in this country who think we are still talking about Senate bill 1944, provides as follows:

Suppose the Secretary of Agriculture is told by the officials of the Bureau of Food and Drugs something about the preparations to be used in cosmetics, we will say. What can he do? He cannot formulate a regulation, as he could have done under the original bill. He must call into consultation the members of a committee appointed by the President of the United States. There are to be two such committees, one on public health, consisting of five persons, to be appointed by the President, "designated by the President with a view to their distinguished scientific attainment and interest in public health and without regard to their political affiliation", just exactly such men as that fine, outstanding man who passed away in Baltimore a few days ago, Dr. Welch. There is to be a committee of five persons on public health, appointed by the President of the United States.

If it is a matter of food, the President shall appoint a committee of 7 members, 3 of whom shall be selected from the public, 2 from the food-producing industry, and 2 from the experts of the Department—a committee of 7, to be appointed by the President of the United States.

When the Secretary decides that he wants to change a regulation, he must notify the committee on public health, or the committee on food standards, as the case may be. Then the Secretary shall call a meeting of the industry involved, and the committee shall sit in, the industry having been given 30 days' notice of that meeting, to give consideration to a revision of the regulations relating to the manufacture and distribution of cosmetics, or whatever it may be. At that public meeting, which is made a matter of record, a formal affair, the arguments are presented pro and con.

Even yet the Secretary could not promulgate the regulation but he must wait until a majority of the committee shall say that the proposed regulation is a good one. Then, when the majority of the committee has said the regulation is desirable, the Secretary shall promulgate the regulation, giving 90 days' time before it is given effect.

Provision is made, as found on page 40, as follows:

> The district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, temporary or permanent, the enforcement by any officer, representative, or employee of the Department of Agriculture of any regulation promulgated as provided in section 22—

Which is the section relating to the committee to be appointed by the President, and its action in considering the regulations—

> if it is shown that the regulation is unreasonable, arbitrary, or capricious, or not in accordance with law, and that the petitioner will suffer substantial damage by reason of its enforcement.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, under that section, I think the Senator will agree, only a question of law would be presented to the court for review. In other words, the findings of fact of the Secretary of Agriculture are to be conclusive.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the committee will recommend a change, so that it will read: "as provided in section 22, if it is shown that the regulation is unreasonable in the light of the facts."

Mr. CLARK. I think that would be a very great improvement of the section.

Mr. COPELAND. That is exactly what is intended. I want all Senators to know that there can be no arbitrary and individual act on the part of the Secretary in promulgating a regulation except under such safeguards as will give full protection to every man, woman, and child involved.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. It seems to me vital to clear up that point, because I have received more criticisms as to the arbitrary powers proposed to be given the Secretary of Agriculture than as to any other provision of the bill. They have been coming in for a long time, by mail and otherwise. So let me see whether I understand it correctly.

A board of review, so-called, or commission, is empowered to hold a public hearing when any regulation is promulgated by the Secretary, or by the board, and as the result of that hearing, if the facts justify it, the board recommends or fails to recommend to the Secretary of Agriculture what is to be done.

Mr. COPELAND. Action must be taken by a majority vote.

Mr. WALCOTT. It must be done by a majority vote. Then, after the order is issued, the offended party, if there be such, has a right of court review, in any event?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. The Senator has stated it exactly as it is.

Could anything be fairer than that? This thing cannot be done in a corner; nor in any secret manner can there be imposed upon the public or upon the industry any arbitrary regulation. When the regulation is promulgated after a public hearing, with the majority support of the committee involved, then there is this court review. I do not see how anything could be fairer.

Mr. FESS. How is the committee to be appointed?

Mr. COPELAND. By the President of the United States.

I am going to ask that at this point, in the interest of brevity, there be printed with my remarks my own statement regarding Senate bill 2800, and what it means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate bill 2800 contains every provision of the present Food and Drugs Act which the experience of 27 years of enforcement has shown to give worthwhile consumer protection. It contains many additional provisions designed to safeguard the health and pocketbook of consumers against abuses which are not reached by the present law.

One of the principal provisions designed to effect added protection is that dealing with advertising. In 1906, when the food law was enacted, advertising did not play an important role in the distribution of food and drug products. The records show that Congress entertained the belief that, if the labels could be kept free from false representations, injury to the public was not likely to result from advertising.

But in the past quarter century the importance of advertising has increased tremendously. The consumer's decision to purchase a product is much more frequently inspired by advertising than by label statements. This growth of advertising for the sale of goods has furnished an opportunity for unscrupulous manufacturers of foods and drugs—and unfortunately there are a few such—to circumvent the intent of the present law by making false claims in advertising. At the same time they have made sure that their label representations are above reproach.

Under S. 2800 any advertising statement which is false or misleading in any particular regarding a food, drug, or cosmetic would become illegal. The bill would effectively put a stop to untruths and exaggerations which are not now permitted on the labels of foods and drugs, because the language employed in defining false advertising is substantially identical with the language of the law now applicable to labels. The Supreme Court, in interpreting this language, has said that this provision condemns every statement, design, and device which may mislead or deceive even though the representation is not technically false but is literally true. The Court pointed out that the provision is to prevent deception resulting from indirection and ambiguity as well as from direct falsehoods. Under this intepretation no more effective language to compel truth in advertising could have been written into the bill.

The present law contains no provision whatever dealing with cosmetics. Fortunately, the great bulk of our cosmetics are harmless and are truthfully labeled and advertised. But there occasionally appear on the market harmful preparations which may result in untold misery for those unfortunate individuals who are victimized into the use of such preparations.

At the hearings before the Senate Committee on Commerce on the proposed food and drug legislation there was exhibited a photograph of a beautiful woman. This showed her as she appeared ready to attend a testimonial banquet given in her honor as a recognition of her unselfish and effective civic work. In preparing for the banquet she had used an eyelash dye labeled and sold for the particular purpose of darkening the eyebrows and lashes. Another photograph was exhibited which had been taken of the same woman several weeks later. Her face was drawn and lined with pain and suffering. Her eyes were sightless.

The lash dye this lady used was an irritant coal-tar poison which had literally burned away the outer coating of her eyeballs. There is no real reason or excuse for the use of such a potentially dangerous dye for the eyelashes and brows. Preparations of the mascara or lamp-black type are easily available and will effectively serve the purpose.

Recent records in the medical literature show dozens of cases of eye injury following the use of the particular coal-tar dye I mentioned. Had S. 2800 been a law when this preparation was placed on the market, the suffering of these persons could have been avoided, because the provisions of this bill include cosmetics of all kinds. They ban from the channels of interstate commerce any preparation for cosmetic purposes that contains a poisonous substance which may render it injurious to the user.

If this bill, instead of the present law, had been in effect, it would likewise have prevented the suffering of many who have been damaged by depilatories containing rat poison, or hair tonics containing arsenic, or hair dyes containing lead, or skin bleaches containing mercury. The proposed law is important to the vast majority of cosmetic manufacturers who put out harmless products, because such cases of poisoning make victims and their acquaintances afraid of all cosmetics.

Let us turn to some of the advantages of S. 2800 has over the present law in the control of abuses that occur in the sale of food products. The present law does not prohibit the sale of a poisonous food if the poison is natural and has not been added. The law applies only to added poison. Under S. 2800 traffic in foods which are dangerous to health is forbidden, whether the danger may arise from natural poison or a poison which has been added.

Under the present law there is no provision authorizing the establishment of tolerances for poisons which unavoidably contaminate many of our foods. The Department, under my bill, will have the authority to prohibit the addition of poisons where they can be avoided. Unfortunately, there are some irresponsible food manufacturers who, for some fancied or real commercial advantage, add dangerously toxic substances to foods. An end must be put to this unnecessary risk to public health. It cannot be stopped under the provisions of the present law.

While the present law prohibits traffic in foods which are filthy, it is unfortunately true that some extremely filthy products which find their way to the market cannot be controlled for the simple reason that technical methods for the detection of filth in food products are woefully inadequate. To stop this menace, S. 2800 requires that foods shipped in interstate commerce shall be prepared, packed, and held under conditions of reasonable cleanliness.

One of the glaring weaknesses of the present law is its failure to provide for definitions of identity for food. Without such definitions all sorts of economic cheat are possible. For example, within recent months the Department, in an effort to protect the consumer's pocketbook, brought action against a shipment of oysters to which a considerable quantity of water had been added, to be sold, of course, at oyster prices. The court held that because there was no legally binding definition of identity for oysters, the Government had not made out a case. Many other similar cheats have had to go unchecked because of this lack of authority. S. 2800 specifically remedies this defect by authorizing the establishment of standards of identity for all foods. It likewise authorizes the establishment of a standard of quality so that low-grade food could be required to bear a label showing it to be of low quality. While there is a similar provision in the present law, it applies to canned food only. S. 2800 extends it to all food.

Another dishonest practice that escapes the present law, but can be stopped under S. 2800, is that of slack filling containers of food and the use of containers that are deceptively shaped, colored, or formed. There were presented to the committee exhibits of food containers which were only partly filled and actually contained less food than smaller containers honestly packed. We likewise had before us specimens of plain or water noodles wrapped in yellow cellophane to make them look as if they were rich in egg.

An outstanding defect of the present law is the fact that while it prohibits label statements that are false or misleading, it does not require labels to tell the whole truth. S. 2800 requires label statements that would reveal substantially the composition of all food. The bill thus recognizes the right of the consumer to have fair information of the composition of the food he buys. This provision would also be effective in discouraging the practice that cannot now be prevented of mixing up a combination of common ingredients and selling it under a fanciful name, suggesting mysterious virtues, at an exorbitant price.

Full and complete information to the consumer concerning the composition of a food is a prime necessity where the food is offered for special dietary purposes. Because of the increasing recognition of the importance of the daily diet in maintaining health there are being offered to the consumer an increasing number of preparations alleged to contain this or that vitamin, or mineral salt, or mysterious combinations of these, with special proteins, carbohydrates, and the like. Every field of nutritional science, in which a vast amount of research work is being done, has been or will be exploited by preparations of this character. It is essential to the well-being of the public that provisions be made to keep abreast of these developments and to require informative labeling to accord with the facts as they are uncovered from time to time. For this reason S. 2800 delegates the power to the enforcing agency to establish regulations requiring fully informative labeling on these special dietary preparations. No provision of this kind occurs in the present law.

Glaring weaknesses in the present law are to be found in its provisions dealing with drugs. These are very sketchy and ill adapted to control of our modern problems in maintaining the integrity, safety, and efficacy of our drug supply. The advantages of S. 2800 over the present law in the control of drugs are even more striking than the advantages of the bill over the present statute in dealing with foods.

There is no prohibition in the present law against drugs which are dangerous to health. As a result of this omission, there have appeared from time to time on the market products intended to cure disease which, when taken in accordance with directions on the label, resulted in the death of the patient or the serious impairment of his health. S. 2800 would put an end to this abuse through its prohibition against traffic in drugs which are dangerous to health under the conditions of use prescribed in the labeling.

Special regulations are authorized for all drugs which are liable to deterioration in the course of their commercial distribution. The purpose of these regulations will be to require methods of packaging to prolong the time the drug will remain potent, and special labeling to show the precautions to be taken in handling the drug to prevent its deterioration as well as to warn against its use after deterioration has occurred. No such provisions are contained in the present law.

A type of drug product has come into very general use since the law of 1906 was passed. I refer to antiseptics, disinfectants, and the like, which are used for the destruction of germ life on or within the body. There is no provision in the present law dealing specifically with preparations of this kind, and in many cases it is difficult or quite impossible to control abuses of consumer confidence through labeling and advertising implying that the drug possesses a germ-killing power beyond its actual worth. S. 2800 sets up standards of germ-killing power for antiseptics and thus provides for the control of extensive abuses that now escape legal restriction.

There are many very useful drugs which should be employed only with great care and discretion because in improper dosage or when administered to children or when the patient is suffering from certain disease complications the effect of these drugs may be disastrous. S. 2800 provides an effective safeguard against these dangers which cannot be controlled under the present law. It requires that all drugs bear explicit directions for use and appropriate warnings against their consumption by children or in certain disease conditions where the use is contraindicated and may be dangerous to health.

The present law defines drugs as substances or mixtures of substances intended to be used for the cure, mitigation, or prevention of disease. This narrow definition permits escape from legal control of all therapeutic or curative devices like electric belts, for example. It also permits the escape of preparations which are intended to alter the structure or some function of the body, as, for example, preparations intended to reduce excessive weight. There are many worthless and some dangerous devices and preparations falling within these classifications. S. 2800 contains ample authority to control them.

One of the weakest provisions of the present law is that dealing with false claims of curative value of drugs. The law now requires that the Government show not only that the claims are false but that the manufacturer when he made those claims on his label knew them to be false. The handicap this throws upon the Government in its effort to protect the sick, who in seeking relief from their condition are anxious to believe in any promised cure, can be appreciated only by those who have witnessed the court trial of such cases. There may be no difficulty whatever in bringing in conclusive evidence that the curative claims are grossly false. But when it comes to showing that the manufacturer knew they were false, when it comes to demonstrating that intent to defraud was in the mind of the individual responsible for the labeling, the handicap is in many instances insurmountable.

Members of the committee got an insight into this difficulty of the present law during the course of the hearings on this bill. Individuals appeared in opposition to the bill who are offering devices for the treatment of such deadly diseases as tuberculosis, diabetes, typhoid fever, and appendicitis. The claim was made by one that by the use of his apparatus he could cure appendicitis in 1 day and tuberculosis in 4 days. Obviously these claims cannot be substantiated, but the witness testified with such earnestness that he could do these wonderful things that I am sure no Member of the committee could conclude that he did not honestly believe he was able to effect these miracles. But however honest the belief of the manufacturer in his ability to cure a bad case of appendicitis in 1 day without surgical treatment, or an advanced case of tuberculosis in 4 days, the effect of these treatments on the patient would not be influenced by the honesty of the manufacturer's belief. Such treatments would have precisely the same result on the patient whether the manufacturer sincerely believed what he said or whether he knew definitely that his claims were untrue.

Because of the weakness in our present law with the Government's inability to cope promptly and successfully with false therapeutic claims, untold thousands of our people have let their diseases progress to incurable stages while temporizing with worthless preparations, instead of securing adequate treatment in time to effect a recovery. S. 2300 stops this great loophole through which endless consumer abuses have crept. Claims for therapeutic value of drugs will be judged solely on their truth or falsity and without regard to whether the manufacturer was honest or dishonest in making them. Furthermore, S. 2800 requires that any claim of effect for a drug shall be supported either by substantial medical opinion or by demonstrable scientific fact. If the bill passes it will no longer be possble for an ignorant individual, having no knowledge whatever of disease and its treatment, to concoct a preparation and recklessly claim that it will cure serious disease.

These requirements on advertising, cosmetics, food, and drugs are protective provisions which do not occur in the present law. But there are other important advantages in S. 2800 in the so-called "implementing" provisions; that is, those provisions authorizing legal procedure to stop and penalize violations. For example, S. 2800 authorizes the enforcing agency to require permits for plants producing foods, drugs, and cosmetics where, because of conditions surrounding the manufacture of the article, it may be dangerous to health and the danger cannot be adequately detected after the goods have moved in interstate commerce. Methods of laboratory examination to detect certain dangers, such, for example, as crabmeat contaminated with the germs of paratyphoid, are slow and uncertain. Without a permit provision there would be no possibility of adequate protection of the public. In any instance where the public cannot be adequately protected by the other provisions of the law, the authority in S. 2800 to require permits can be invoked and the Department can require the manufacturer to set up the necessary precautions in his plant to insure the purity of his product.

While the present law authorizes the seizure of adulterated and misbranded products in interstate commerce, the procedure for filing such action is awkward and requires considerable time. When dealing with products which are imminently dangerous to health, the loss of this time is a serious matter. S. 2800 overcomes this difficulty by authorizing so-called "executive seizure" of imminently dangerous foods, drugs, and cosmetics. Custody of the seized goods in then placed within the jurisdiction of the proper Federal court.

Some manufacturers have regarded the extremely low penalties provided by the present food and drugs law as nothing more than license fees for conducting illegitimate business. S. 2800 increases these penalties so that substantial fines can be collected and jail sentences imposed. S. 2800 also is drawn to authorize action to stop violations at the source. Under the present law action can be taken only by the criminal prosecution of the shipper or the seizure of his goods after he has distributed them in interstate commerce. Usually criminal prosecutions can be filed only months after the offense has been committed. It is frequently quite difficult to take seizure action against shipments of dangerous products that may be scattered far and wide. Under the bill a provision is made whereby the Government can restrain a manufacturer by injunction from shipping goods in violation of the law or from the repetitious advertising of such goods. This would stop the offense promptly and at its source.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate now proceed to consideration of the amendments so that the bill may be perfected in form, regardless of what may be its fate as to passage.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have on my desk a statement, rather long but exceedingly interesting, from the International Apple Association, of Rochester, N.Y., objecting to certain provisions of the bill and its general purpose, and with respect to the arbitrary power being placed in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of the measure. Has the Senator met those objections?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. A few moments ago the Senator said he had been discussing this matter today with some of the representatives of the apple growers.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. What was the result of the conference?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to answer the question in full, because there is hardly a Senator here who is not interested in apples.

Let us turn first to page 8 of the bill. I may say that it is not only apples that I will discuss briefly for a moment but all fresh fruits and vegetables.

Mr. McNARY. What page, may I ask?

Mr. COPELAND. Page 8. It is proposed, after the word "act", on line 11, that there be inserted "the individual containers used in the distribution of small fruits."

The Senator will observe that the bill requires that all packages of fruits be labeled with the name of the manufacturer, the quantity of the contents in terms of weight, measure, or numerical count. It would cause distress to the berry growers and others engaged in marketing small fruits that this information should be put upon the individual package. By this amendment we spare that unnecessary trouble.

Then, on page 10, line 9, the apple men from my State and other States found fault with the language "the common or usual name of each ingredient such food bears or contains the order of predominance by weight." They said that would mean that an arbitrary Secretary of Agriculture might say that it should have so much pectin, and so much malic acid, and that all the chemical ingredients of the apple should be included. So that has been changed, in line 10, may I say to the Senator, to strike out "such" and to insert "which any fabricated", so it will read: "the common or usual name of each ingredient which any fabricated food bears." So this answers that particular criticism of the apple men.

We come now to page 32, line 2. They were unwilling to have apples included on the theory that an arbitrary Secretary of Agriculture might say that all apples must be russets, or northern spies, and so forth. That the brands should actually be named. Therefore, it is proposed to insert, in line 2, after the word "or", a comma and "(except for fresh fruits and vegetables) any."

Therefore the apples will be excluded from the operation of that particular section of the bill.

Then, on standards, section 11, page 18, if the Senator will observe, in line 13, there is inserted "Provided, That no standards of quality shall be established for fresh fruits and fresh vegetables."

On page 36, line 8, the apple men desired to have "shall" stricken out and "may" inserted. That seemed to the Department and to all concerned to be a proper change.

We come now to page 40, probably the most bitterly contested part of the bill, so far as the apple men were concerned.

On line 7, after the word "jurisdiction", insert a comma and the language "on complaint of any interested person", on the theory that apples might be shipped in commerce, and perhaps some bank hold the shipping bills, the original possessor not having them, that any interested person might make this application to the court.

Then, on line 13, change "will" to "may"; and insert on line 11, at the end, "in the light of the facts."

The Senator may recall that we had a long debate over the language at the top of page 40:

> In formulating regulations under paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section, the findings of fact by the Secretary shall be conclusive if in accordance with law.

That was bitterly contested and opposed by everyone, I believe. It was felt that it was not right that the Secretary should be given the power to determine conclusively and finally the facts in a given case. So that language is stricken out.

At the end of line 11 the language is inserted, "in the light of the fact", and at the end of the paragraph, line 20, there is added "on any of the grounds set forth above."

With these changes it is my opinion, may I say to the Senator from Oregon, that the apple men will be content.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire to know whether the procedure and policy under the long-established legal principle concerning the shifting of the burden of proof still remain a part of the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. There is no present complaint on this score.

There is another item which I quite overlooked. On page 25 the apple men were dissatisfied with paragraph (b), line 4, and were anxious to have this language, which we accepted:

> If recovery is had in any suit or proceeding against any officer or employee by reason of a seizure pursuant to any such order, and the court certifies that there is probable cause for the acts done by such officer or employee, or that he acted under the direction of the Secretary or a duly designated officer of the Food and Drug Administration, no execution shall issue against such officer or employee, but the amount so recovered shall, upon final judgment, be provided for and paid out of appropriations for the administration of this act.

Therefore, with the right of appeal, and with the assessment of damages in case they are found to be justified, the apple men, so far as I know, are content.

Did the Senator have another question?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. The able Senator has been very patient in his consideration of the bill. I assume from what was said a few moments ago that it is the Senator's desire to consider committee amendments?

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to perfect the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I observe there is scarcely a quorum present.

Mr. COPELAND. My judgment is, may I say to the Senator, that the amendments are of small consequence, but yet, after all, they are needed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I do not know of any proposed legislation concerning which more correspondence has come to my office pro and con, and I am not sufficiently acquainted with the bill to know whether some of those slight amendments might not be very important.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to say that if on further study any Senator finds that he desires a reconsideration of any one of the amendments, I will not resist reconsideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me suggest that that might be a practical way to proceed, if the Senator is going through his bill with some continuity of procedure, but probably tomorrow we may take up the tariff bill. There are only 2 days given for the filing of a motion to reconsider. By the time we again approach the consideration of the bill the interim will probably be greater than is permitted by the rule, and for that reason, unless it is purposed to go through the bill with some continuity, it would be rather unfortunate, in view of the few Senators present, to go farther tonight with the committee amendments.

Mr. COPELAND. Then I suggest that there be a reprint of the bill, with all the committee amendments, many of which are now in pencil, so that the next time we reach the bill it may be before us in its perfected form, and then an opportunity will be given for Senators to study the measure.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no objection to a reprint of the Senator's bill, for such uses as he may desire, but I should not want it understood that any of the amendments offered were agreed to in any way, directly or indirectly.

Mr. COPELAND. I have no such thought.

Mr. McNARY. Such an understanding as that would be impossible. It is just done for the convenience of the Members of the Senate, without any formal action having been taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator just desired to have all his amendments printed in the bill. Are the amendments those of the Senator or of the committee?

Mr. COPELAND. They are the subcommittee amendments. Most of them are insignificant.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course we cannot tell about their importance until we examine them. We have not had a chance to do so.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say that no one is pressing for final action today. The bill will simply be here in the perfected form so that every Senator will have a copy.

Mr. McKELLAR. With that understanding, Mr. President, I have no objection.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be reprinted as I have suggested, and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The bill will be reprinted with the committee amendments and will be printed in the RECORD.

S. 2800

A bill to prevent the manufacture, shipment, and sale of adulterated or misbranded food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics, and to regulate traffic therein; to prevent the false advertisement of food, drink, drugs, and cosmetics; and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Federal Food and Drugs Act."

DEFINITION OF TERMS

SEC. 2. As used in this act, unless the context otherwise indicates—

(a) The term "food" includes all substances and preparations used for, or entering into the composition of, food, drink, confectionery, or condiment for man or other animals.

(b) The term "drug", for the purposes of this act and not to regulate the legalized practice of [medicine] the healing art, includes (1) all substances and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia, Homœopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States, or National Formulary or supplements thereto; and (2) all substances, preparations, and devices intended for use in the cure, mitigation, treatment, or prevention of disease in man or other animals; and (3) all substances and preparations, other than food, and all devices intended to affect the structure or any function of the body.

(c) The term "cosmetic" includes all substances and preparations, except unmedicated soap, intended for cleansing, or altering the appearance of, or promoting the attractiveness of, the person.

(d) The term "Territory" means any Territory or possession of the United States, including the District of Columbia.

(e) The term "interstate commerce" means (1) commerce between any State or Territory and any place outside thereof, [or between points within the same State or Territory but through any place outside thereof,] and (2) commerce or manufacture within the District of Columbia or within any other territory not organized with a legislative body.

(f) The term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, and association.

(g) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture.

(h) The term "label" means the principal label or labels (1) upon the immediate container of any food, drug, or cosmetic, and (2) upon the outside container or wrapper, if any there be, of the retail package of any food, drug, or cosmetic.

(i) The term "labeling" includes all labels and other written, printed, and graphic matter, in any form whatsoever, accompanying any food, drug, or cosmetic.

(j) The term "advertisement" includes all representations of fact or opinion disseminated in any manner or by any means other than by the labeling.

(k) The term "medical profession" means the professions of [physicians, pharmacologists, dentists, and veterinarians] medicine, pharmacology, dentistry, and veterinary medicine; and the term "medical opinion" means the opinion of [physicians, pharmacologists, dentists, or veterinarians] members of these professions [relating to the fields of their respective professions] in their respective fields.

(l) The term "official compendium" means the United States Pharmacopœia, Homœopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States, National Formulary, or any supplement thereto, official at the time any drug to which the provisions thereof relate is introduced into interstate commerce.

ADULTERATED FOOD

SEC. 3. A food shall be deemed to be adulterated—

(a) (1) If it bears or contains any poisonous or deleterious substance which may render it dangerous to health; or (2) if it bears or contains any added poisonous or added deleterious substance prohibited, or in excess of the limits of tolerance prescribed, by regulations as provided by sections 10 and 22; or (3) if it consists in whole or in part of any filthy, putrid, or decomposed substance; or (4) if it has been prepared, packed, or held under insanitary conditions whereby it may have become contaminated with filth; or (5) if it is the product of a diseased animal or of an animal which has died otherwise than by slaughter; or (6) if its container is composed of any poisonous or deleterious substance which may by contamination render the contents injurious to health.

(b) (1) If any valuable constituent has been in whole or in part abstracted therefrom; or (2) if any substance has been substituted wholly or in part therefor; or (3) if damage or inferiority has been concealed in any manner; or (4) if any substance has been added thereto or mixed or packed therewith so as to increase its bulk or weight [in a deceptive manner,] or reduce its quality or strength, or create a deceptive appearance.

(c) If it is confectionery or ice cream and bears or contains any alcohol, resinous glaze, or nonnutritive substance except masticatory substances in chewing gum, coloring, flavoring, natural gums, and pectin.

(d) If it contains a coal-tar color other than one from a batch that has been certified in accordance with regulations as provided by sections 10 and 22.

ADULTERATED DRUGS

SEC. 4. A drug shall be deemed to be adulterated—

(a) If it is dangerous to health under the conditions of use prescribed in the labeling thereof.

(b) If its name is the same as or simulates a name recognized in an official compendium, or if it purports to be a drug the name of which is so recognized, and it (1) fails to meet the definition, manufacturing formula, and description set forth therein, or (2) differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity as determined by the tests or methods of assay set forth therein; except that whenever tests or methods of assay have not been prescribed therein, or such tests or methods of assay as are prescribed are insufficient, for determining whether or not such drug complies with such standard, the Secretary is hereby authorized to bring such fact to the attention of the appropriate body charged with the revision of such compendium and if such body fails within a reasonable time to prescribe tests or methods of assay which are sufficient, then the Secretary may prescribe for the purposes of this act such tests or methods of assay by regulations as provided by section 22. No drug shall be deemed to be adulterated under subdivision (2) of this paragraph if its label bears, in juxtaposition with the name of the drug, a statement indicating wherein its strength, quality, and purity differ from the standard of strength, quality, and purity set forth in the appropriate official compendium, as determined by the tests or methods of assay applicable under this paragraph. Whenever a drug is recognized in both the United States Pharamacopœia and the Homœopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States it shall be subject to the requirements of the United States Pharmacopœia unless it is labeled and offered for sale as a homeopathic drug, in which case it shall be subject to the provisions of the Homœopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States and not to those of the United States Pharmacopœia.

(c) If it is not subject to the provisions of paragraph (b) of this section and its identity or strength differs from, or its purity or quality falls below, that which it purports or is represented to possess.

(d) If any substance has been (1) mixed or packed therewith so as to reduce its quality or strength [in a deceptive manner,] or (2) substituted wholly or in part therefor.

ADULTERATED COSMETICS

SEC. 5. A cosmetic shall be deemed to be adulterated—

(a) If it bears or contains any poisonous or deleterious substance in such quantity as may render it injurious to the user under the conditions of use prescribed in the labeling thereof, or under such conditions of use as are customary or usual.

(b) If it bears or contains any poisonous or deleterious ingredient prohibited, or in excess of the limits of tolerance prescribed, by regulations as provided by sections 10 and 22.

MISBRANDED FOOD, DRUGS, AND COSMETICS—GENERAL

SEC. 6. A food, drug, or cosmetic shall be deemed to be misbranded—

(a) If its labeling is false or misleading in any particular. Any representation concerning any effect of a drug shall be deemed to be false under this paragraph if that representation is not supported by substantial medical opinion or by demonstrable scientific facts.

(b) If in package form it fails to bear a label containing: (1) The name and place of business of the manufacturer, packer, seller, or distributor; and (2) an accurate statement of the quantity of the contents in terms of weight, measure, or numerical count: Provided, That under subdivision (2) of this paragraph reasonable variations shall be permitted, and exemptions as to small packages shall be established, by regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

(c) The Secretary is hereby authorized to promulgate regulations exempting from any labeling or packaging requirements of this act the individual containers used in the distribution of small fruits, and also food, drugs, and cosmetics which are, in accordance with the practice of the trade, processed, labeled, or repacked in substantial quantities at establishments other than those where originally processed or packed, on condition that such articles are in conformity with the provisions of this act upon removal from such processing, labeling, or repacking establishment.

(d) If any word, statement, or other information required on the label to avoid adulteration or misbranding under any provision of this act is not prominently placed thereon in such a manner as to be easily seen and in such terms as to be readily intelligible to the purchasers and users of such articles under customary conditions of purchase and use.

MISBRANDED FOOD

SEC. 7. A food shall be deemed to be misbranded—

(a) (1) If its container is so made, formed, or filled as to mislead the purchaser, or (2) if its contents fall below the [minimum] standard of fill prescribed by regulations as provided by sections 11 and 22.

(b) If it is offered for sale under the name of another food.

(c) If it is an imitation of another food, except that no imitation shall be deemed to be misbranded under this paragraph if its label bears the word "imitation" in juxtaposition with and in type of the same size and prominence as the name of the food imitated.

(d) If it purports to be or is represented as a food for which a definition and standard of identity have been prescribed by regulations as provided by sections 11 and 22, and (1) its label fails to bear the name of the food prescribed in the definition and [minimum] standard, or (2) it fails to conform to such definition and [minimum] standard.

[(e) If it purports to be or is represented as a food for which a minimum standard of quality has been prescribed by regulations as provided by sections 11 and 22, and (1) its label fails to bear, if so required by the regulations, a statement of a standard of quality in such terms as the regulations specify, or (2) it falls below such standard.]

(e) If it purports to be or is represented as a food for which a standard of quality has been prescribed by regulations as provided by sections 11 and 22 and its quality falls below such standard, and its label fails to bear a statement in such terms as the regulations specify showing that it falls below such standard.

(f) If it is not subject to paragraph (d) of this section and its label fails to bear (1) the common or usual name of the food, if any there be, and (2) the common or usual name of each ingredient [such] which any fabricated food bears or contains in order of predominance by weight; except that spices, flavors, and colorings, other than those sold as such, may be designated as spices, flavors, and colorings without naming each: Provided, That, to the extent that compliance with the requirements of subdivision (2) of this paragraph is impracticable because of normal variations in ingredients or their quantities, usual to good manufacturing or packing practice, reasonable variations from the stated order of such ingredients shall be permitted, and exemptions as to packages of assorted food shall be established, by regulations promulgated by the Secretary.

(g) If it [is] purports to be or is represented for special dietary uses, such as by infants or invalids or for other special nutritional requirements, and its label fails to bear, if so required by regulations as provided by section 22, statements concerning its vitamin, mineral, and other dietary properties which fully inform the purchaser as to its nutritional value.

MISBRANDED DRUGS

SEC. 8. A drug shall be deemed to be misbranded—

(a) If its labeling bears the name of any disease for which the drug is not a specific cure but is a palliative, and fails to bear a plain and conspicuous statement, so placed as to be readily observable where such name occurs, indicating that the drug is a palliative and [how the palliation is effected] the nature of its palliative action.

(b) If it is for internal use by man and contains any quantity of any of the following narcotic or hypnotic substances: Alpha eucaine, barbital, beta eucaine, bromal, cannabis, carbromal, chloral, coca, cocaine, codeine, heroin, marihuana, morphine, opium, paraldehyde, peyote, sulphonmethane, or any narcotic or hypnotic substance chemically derived therefrom, or any other narcotic or hypnotic substance which is habit forming, and its label fails to bear the name and quantity or proportion of such substance or derivative in juxtaposition with the statement "Warning—May be habit forming."

(c) If it contains any quantity of (1) any of the stimulant-depressant substances ethyl alcohol, ethyl ether, chloroform, or isopropyl alcohol; or (2) any of the sedative substances, acetanilid, actephenetidin, amidopyrine, antipyrine, atropine, bromides, hyoscine, or hyoscyamine; or (3) any of the cumulative substances arsenic, digitalis glucosides, mercury, ouabain, strophanthin, or strychnine; or (4) any crude plant material or preparation thereof in which any substance named in subdivision (2) or (3) above is present; or (5) any chemical compound of any substance named above possessing stimulant-depressant, sedative, or cumulative properties; and its label fails to bear a statement of the name and quantity or proportion of such substance, or crude plant material or preparation thereof, or chemical compound, as the case may be: Provided, That no drug shall be deemed subject to the provisions of this paragraph by reason of its containing arsenic as arsenic trioxide in a quantity less than one five-hundredths grain per single maximum dose and such arsenic is derived solely from crude plant material in which such arsenic is a natural constituent.

(d) If it is not designated solely by a name recognized in an official compendium and its label fails to bear a common or usual name of the drug, if such there be.

(e) If its labeling fails to bear plainly and conspicuously (1) complete and explicit directions for use, and (2) such warnings in such manner and form as may be prescribed by regulations, as provided by section 22, against use in such pathological conditions or by children where its use is contra-indicated and may be dangerous to health, or against unsafe dosage or methods of administration or application: Provided, That where any requirement of subdivision (1) of this paragraph, as applied to any drug, is not necessary for the protection of the public health, the Secretary shall promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, exempting such drug from such requirement.

(f) If its name is the same as, or simulates, a name recognized in an official compendium and it is not packaged and labeled as prescribed therein. Whenever a drug is recognized in both the United States Pharmacopœia and the Homœopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States it shall be subject to the requirements of the United States Pharmacopœia with respect to packaging and labeling unless it is labeled and offered for sale as a homeopathic drug, in which case it shall be subject to the provisions of the Homœopathic Pharmacopœia of the United States and not to those of the United States Pharmacopœia.

(g) If it has been designated by regulations, as provided by section 22, as a drug liable to deterioration, and is not packaged in such form or manner, or its label fails to bear a statement of such precautions, as such regulations require for the protection of public health. No such regulation shall be established for any drug recognized in an official compendium until the Secretary shall have informed the appropriate body charged with the revision of such compendium of the need for such packaging or labeling requirements and such body shall have failed within a reasonable time to prescribe such requirements.

(h) (1) If its container is so made, formed, or filled as to mislead the purchaser; or (2) if it is an imitation of another drug; or (3) if it is offered for sale under the name of another drug.

(i) If it purports to be or is represented as a germicide, bactericide, disinfectant, or antiseptic for any use on or within the body and its labeling fails to bear a plain and conspicuous statement of such use, including the strength or dilution, manner, and duration of application, and when tested by methods simulating as nearly as practicable the conditions of such use, or in the absence of such methods, when tested by a standard method, it does not have the germicidal effect within the duration so prescribed of a one to eighty dilution of phenol used by a standard testing method for 10 minutes at 37° centigrade. All testing methods for the purposes of this paragraph shall be prescribed by regulations as provided by section 22: Provided, That no drug shall be deemed to be misbranded under this paragraph by reason of failure of its labeling to bear a statement of any advertised use if such advertising is disseminated to members of the medical and pharmaceutical professions only, or appears in scientific publications of these professions.

(j) If it purports to be or is represented as an inhibitory antiseptic for any use as a wet dressing, ointment, dusting powder, or such other use as involves prolonged contact with the body and its labeling fails to bear a plain and conspicuous statement of such use, including strength or dilution and manner of application, and when tested by methods simulating as nearly as practicable the duration of application and other conditions of such use, or in the absence of such methods when tested by a standard method, it fails to prevent the growth of micro-organisms within the entire time of such duration. All testing methods for the purposes of this paragraph shall be prescribed by regulations as provided by section 22: Provided, That no drug shall be deemed to be misbranded under this paragraph by reason of failure of its labeling to bear a statement of any advertised use if such advertising is disseminated to members of the medical and pharmaceutical professions only, or appears in scientific publications of these professions.

FALSE ADVERTISEMENT

SEC. 9. (a) An advertisement of a food, drug, or cosmetic shall be deemed to be false if it is false or misleading in any particular relevant to the purposes of this act regarding such food, drug, or cosmetic. Any representation concerning any effect of a drug shall be deemed to be false under this paragraph if that representation is not supported by substantial medical opinion or by demonstrable scientific facts.

(b) An advertisement of a drug shall also be deemed to be false if it contains the name of any disease for which the drug is not a specific cure but is a palliative and fails to contain a plain and conspicuous statement, so placed as to be readily observable where such name occurs, indicating that the drug is a palliative [and how the palliation is effected] and the nature of its palliative action.

[(c) To discourage the public advertisement for sale in interstate commerce of drugs for diseases wherein self-medication may be especially dangerous, or patently contrary to the interests of public health, any advertisement of a drug representing it to have any effect in the treatment of any of the following diseases shall be deemed to be false: Albuminuria, appendicitis, arteriosclerosis, blood poison, bone diseases, cancer, carbuncle, cataract, cholecystitis, dental caries or erosion, diabetes, diphtheria, dropsy, encephalitis, epilepsy, erysipelas, gallstones, goiter, heart diseases, high blood pressure, mastoiditis, measles, meningitis, mumps, nephritis, otitis media, paralysis, periodontal diseases, pneumonia, poliomyelitis, prostate-gland disorders, pyelitis, scarlet fever, sexual impotence, sinus infections, smallpox, tuberculosis, tumors, typhoid, uremia, venereal diseases, and whooping cough; except that no advertisement not in violation of paragraph (a) or (b) of this section shall be deemed to be false under this paragraph if it is disseminated to members of the medical and pharmaceutical professions only or appears in the scientific periodicals of these professions, or if it is disseminated for the purpose of public-health education by persons not commercially interested, directly or indirectly, in the sale of such drugs: Provided, That whenever the Secretary determines that an advance in medical science has made any type of self-medication safe as to any of the diseases enumerated above, he shall promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, exempting the advertisement of drugs having curative or therapeutic effect for such disease from the operation of this paragraph, subject to such conditions and restrictions as may be necessary in the interests of public health.]

TOLERANCES FOR POISONOUS INGREDIENTS IN FOOD AND COSMETICS AND CERTIFICATION OF COAL-TAR COLORS FOR FOOD

SEC. 10. (a) If an added poisonous or added deleterious substance in or on food or cosmetics is or may be injurious to health, the Secretary is hereby authorized to promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, prohibiting such added substance in or on any food or cosmetic, or establishing tolerances limiting the amount therein or thereon, for the protection of public health, taking into account the extent to which the use of such substance is required in the production of such food or cosmetic and the other ways in which the consumer may be affected by the same or other poisonous or deleterious substances.

(b) The Secretary is hereby authorized to promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, for the certification of coal-tar colors which are harmless and suitable for use in food.

DEFINITIONS AND STANDARDS FOR FOOD

SEC. 11. For the effectuation of the purposes of this act the Secretary is hereby authorized to promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, fixing and establishing for any food [(1)] a definition and standard of identity, and [(2) one objectively determinable minimum] a reasonable standard of quality and fill of container: Provided, That no standards of quality shall be established for fresh fruits and fresh vegetables.

PERMIT FACTORIES

SEC. 12. (a) Whenever the Secretary finds that the distribution in interstate commerce of any class of food, drugs, or cosmetics may, by reason of conditions surrounding the manufacture, processing, or packing thereof, be injurious to health, and such injurious nature cannot be adequately determined after such articles have entered interstate commerce, and in such case only, he is authorized to promulgate regulations, as provided by section 22, governing the conditions of manufacture, processing, or packing necessary to protect the public health, and requiring manufacturers, processors, and packers of such class of articles to hold permits conditioned on compliance with such regulations.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to issue such permits for such periods of time as he may by regulations prescribe and to make regulations governing the issuance and renewal thereof. The Secretary is authorized to suspend immediately upon notice any permit issued under authority of this section if it is found that any of the conditions of the permit have been violated. The Secretary shall reinstate the permit whenever, after hearing and an inspection of the establishment, it is found that adequate measures have been taken to comply with and maintain the conditions of the original permit.

(c) Any officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary shall have access to any factory or establishment, the operator of which holds a permit from the Secretary, fo rthe purpose of ascertaining whether or not the conditions of the permit are being complied with, and denial of access for such inspection shall be ground for suspension of the permit until such access is freely given by the operator.

FACTORY INSPECTION

SEC. 13. (a) In order adequately to regulate interstate commerce in food, drugs, and cosmetics, and enforce the provisions of this act, officers or employees duly designated by the Secretary, after first making reasonable request and obtaining permission of the owner, operator, or custodian thereof, are authorized (1) to enter any factory, warehouse, or establishment in which food, drugs, or cosmetics are manufactured, processed, packed, or held for shipment in interstate commerce or are held after such shipment, or to enter any vehicle being used to transport such food, drugs, or cosmetics, in interstate commerce; and (2) to inspect such factory, warehouse, establishment, or vehicle and all equipment, finished and unfinished materials, containers, and labels there used or stored.

(b) The several district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, temporary or permanent, the shipment in interstate commerce or delivery after receipt in interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic from or by any factory, warehouse, establishment, or vehicle, designated in paragraph (a) of this section if the owner, operator, or custodian thereof has denied to officers or employees duly designated by the Secretary permission, after reasonable request, so to enter and inspect such factory, warehouse, establishment, or vehicle and equipment, finished and unfinished materials, containers, and labels there used or stored. Whenever such permission is granted, the injunction issued pursuant to this paragraph shall be dissolved, or may be continued in force subject to such conditions governing the inspection as the court may order. Violation of any injunction issued pursuant to this paragraph may be summarily tried and punished by the court as a contempt. Such contempt proceedings may be instituted by order of the court or by the filing of an information by the United States attorney.

RECORDS OF INTERSTATE SHIPMENT

SEC. 14. For the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act, carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 49), and other carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and persons receiving food, drugs, or cosmetics in interstate commerce, shall, upon the request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary, permit such officer or employee to have access to and to copy all records showing the movement in interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic, and the quantity, shipper, and consignee thereof; and it shall be unlawful for any such carrier or person to fail to permit such access to and copying of any such record so requested when such request is accompanied by a definite statement in writing specifying the nature or kind of food, drug, or cosmetic to which such request relates: Provided, That evidence obtained under this section shall not be used in a criminal prosecution of the person from whom obtained: Provided further, That carriers hereinbefore designated shall not be subject to the provisions of this act by reason of their receipt, carriage, or delivery of food, drugs, cosmetics, or advertising matter in the usual course of business as carriers.

INVESTIGATIONS AND INSTITUTION OF PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 15. (a) The Secretary is authorized to conduct examinations and investigations for the purposes of this act through officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture or through any health, food, or drug officer or employee of any State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof, duly commissioned by the Secretary. For the purposes of consultation in formulating general administrative policies for the enforcement of this act, the Secretary is authorized to appoint an advisory committee from each of the following groups: The food industry, the drug industry, the cosmetic industry, disseminators of advertising, the public. To aid in securing compliance with the requirements of this act, the Secretary is further authorized to accept plans for such self-regulation of advertising [and commercial] practices as tend to effectuate the purposes of this act, when presented by associations or groups representative of their industries: Provided, That [such plans shall not restrict] nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as restricting the responsibilities and powers conferred upon the Secretary by this [act and shall not be] act, and no plans shall be accepted which are designed to promote monopolies or eliminate or oppress legitimate enterprise.

(b) It shall be the duty of each United States attorney to whom satisfactory evidence has been presented by the Secretary of any violation for institution of criminal, libel for condemnation, or other proceedings under this act, or to whom any health, food, or drug officer of any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, presents evidence satisfactory to the United States attorney of any such violation, to cause appropriate proceedings to be instituted in the proper courts of the United States without delay. All suits instituted under this act other than those pursuant to section 19, paragraph (c), and section 23 shall be by and in the name of the United States.

(c) The Secretary shall, before reporting any violation of this act to the United States attorney for institution of criminal proceedings thereunder, afford due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested persons in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary shall prescribe. The report of the Secretary to the United States attorney for the institution of criminal proceedings under this act shall be accompanied by findings of the appropriate officers and employees, duly authenticated under their oaths. Nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring the Secretary to report for prosecution or for the institution of libel or injunction proceedings minor violations of this act whenever he believes that the purposes of the act can best be accomplished by a suitable notice or warning.

SEIZURE

SEC. 16. (a) Any article of food, drug, or cosmetic in interstate commerce that is adulterated or misbranded or that has been manufactured, processed, or packed in a factory or establishment, the operator of which did not, at the time of manufacture, processing, or packing, hold [a] an unsuspended valid permit, if so required by regulations under section 12, shall be liable to be proceeded against while in interstate commerce or at any time thereafter on libel of information and condemned in any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the article is found. The article shall be liable to seizure (1) by process pursuant to the libel, or (2) if a chief of station or other officer of the Food and Drug Administration, duly designated by the Secretary, has probable cause to believe that the article is so adulterated as to be imminently dangerous to health, then, and in such case only, by order of such officer, issued under his oath of office, particularly describing the article to be seized, the place where located, and the officer or employee to make the seizure. In case of seizure pursuant to any such order, the jurisdiction of the court shall attach upon such seizure. Any article seized pursuant to any such order shall thereupon be promptly placed in the custody of the court and a libel of information shall be promptly filed for condemnation thereof.

[(b) When, upon the trial of any cause instituted pursuant to paragraph (a), subdivision (2), of this section, judgment is rendered for the claimant, but it appears to the court that there was reasonable cause for the seizure, the court shall cause a proper certificate thereof to be entered, and no officer or employee of the United States shall be liable to suit or judgment by reason of the seizure of the goods or the institution of such proceedings.]

(b) If recovery is had in any suit or proceeding against any officer or employee by reason of a seizure pursuant to any such order, and the court certifies that there is probable cause for the acts done by such officer or employee, or that he acted under the direction of the Secretary or a duly designated officer of the Food and Drug Administration, no execution shall issue against such officer or employee, but the amount so recovered shall, upon final judgment, be provided for and paid out of appropriations for the administration of this act.

(c) The court [may] shall, by order at any time before trial, allow any party to a condemnation proceeding to obtain a representative sample of the article seized.

(d) Any article of food, drug, or cosmetic condemned under this section shall, after entry of the decree, be disposed of by destruction or sale as the court may, in accordance with the provisions of this section, direct and the proceeds thereof, if sold, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; but such article shall not be sold under such decree contrary to the provisions of this act or the laws of the jurisdiction in which sold: Provided, That after entry of the decree and upon the payment of the costs of such proceedings and the execution of a good and sufficient bond conditioned that such article of food, drug, or cosmetic shall not be sold or disposed of contrary to the provisions of this act or the laws of any State or Territory, the court may by order direct that such article be delivered to the owner thereof to be destroyed or brought into compliance with the provisions of this act under the supervision of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary, and the expenses of such supervision shall be paid by the party obtaining release of the article under bond. Any article condemned by reason of the manufacturer, processor, or packer not holding [a] an unsuspended valid permit when so required by regulations under section 12 shall be disposed of by destruction.

(e) The proceedings in cases under this section shall conform, as nearly as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty; except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case.

(f) When a decree of condemnation is entered against the article, court costs and fees, and storage and other proper expenses, shall be awarded against the person, if any, intervening as claimant of the article.

PENALTIES

SEC. 17. (a) The following acts are hereby prohibited:

(1) The introduction into interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic that is adulterated or misbranded.

(2) The adulteration or misbranding of any food, drug, or cosmetic in interstate commerce.

(3) The receipt in interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic that is adulterated or misbranded and the delivery or proffered delivery thereof in the original unbroken package for pay or otherwise.

(4) The dissemination of any false advertisement by radio broadcast, United States mails, or in interstate commerce for the purpose of inducing, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, or cosmetics.

(5) The dissemination of a false advertisement by any means for the purpose of inducing, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, or cosmetics in interstate commerce.

(6) The introduction into interstate commerce of any food, drug, or cosmetic if the manufacturer, processor, or packer does not hold [a] an unsuspended valid permit when so required by regulations under section 12.

(7) The refusal to permit access to or copying of any record as required by section 14.

(b) Any person who violates or causes to be violated any of the provisions of paragraph (a) of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction thereof be subject to imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or both such imprisonment and fine; and for a second or subsequent offense imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $3,000, or both such imprisonment and fine.

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (b) of this section, in case of a willful offense the penalty shall be imprisonment for not more than 3 years, or a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, or both such imprisonment and fine.

[(d) No person acting in the capacity of publisher, advertising agency, or radiobroadcast licensee shall be deemed in violation of paragraphs (b) or (c) of this section by reason of the dissemination of any false advertisiment. Any such person who, on reasonable request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary, willfully refuses to furnish the name and post-office address of the person who caused him to disseminate such advertisement shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction thereof be subject to the penalties prescribed in paragraph (b) of this section.]

(d) No publisher, radiobroadcast licensee, or other agency or medium for the dissemination of advertising shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of paragraphs (b) or (c) of this section by reason of the dissemination of any false advertisement, but the liability shall rest upon the manufacturer, packer, distributor, or seller who caused the dissemination of such advertisement. Any publisher, radiobroadcast licensee, or other agency or medium for the dissemination of advertising, who, on reasonable request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary, willfully refuses to furnish the name and post-office address of the person who caused him to disseminate such advertisement shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall on conviction thereof be subject to the penalties prescribed in paragraph (b) of this section.

[(c) No dealer shall be prosecuted under paragraph (b) of this section (1) because of commerce in any article he has purchased or received in good faith if he furnishes on request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary the name and address of the person from whom he purchased or received such article, or (2)] (e) No dealer shall be prosecuted under paragraph (b) of this section (1) for having received in interstate commerce an article and in good faith sold it, unless he refuses to furnish on request of an officer or employee duly designated by the Secretary the name and address of the person from whom he purchased or received such article and all documents pertaining to the delivery of the article to him, or (2) if he establishes a guaranty or undertaking signed by the person residing in the United States from whom he received in good faith the article of food, drug, or cosmetic, or the advertising copy therefor, to the effect that such person assumes full responsibility for any violation of this act, designating it, which may be incurred by the introduction of such article into interstate commerce or by the dissemination of such advertising. To afford protection, such guaranty or undertaking shall contain the name and address of the person furnishing such guaranty or undertaking, and such person shall be amenable to the prosecution and penalties which would attach in due course to the dealer under the provisions of this act. No retail dealer shall be prosecuted under this section for the dissemination, other than by radio broadcast, of any advertisement offering for sale at his place of business any product which is not distributed or sold in interstate commerce.

(f) Any person who forges, counterfeits, simulates, or falsely represents, or without proper authority uses any mark, stamp, tag, label, or other identification device required by regulations promulgated for the enforcement of the provisions of section 12 shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof be subject to imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or both such imprisonment and fine.

(g) Any person who uses to his own advantage or reveals, other than to the Secretary or his officers or employees, or to the courts when relevant in the trial of any case under this act, any information acquired under authority of sections 12 or 13 concerning any method or process which is entitled to protection in equity as a trade secret, shall be guilty of a felony, and shall on conviction thereof be subject to imprisonment for not more than 2 years or a fine of not more than $5,000, or both such imprisonment and fine.

LIABILITY OF CORPORATIONS AND THEIR OFFICERS

SEC. 18. (a) When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, employee, or agent acting for or employed by any person, within the scope of his employment or office, shall in every case be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such person, as well as that of the officer, employee, or agent.

(b) Whenever a corporation or association violates any of the provisions of this act, such violation shall also be deemed to be a violation of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation or association who personally ordered, or did any of the acts constituting, in whole or in part, such violation.

INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 19. (a) Each of the following acts is hereby declared to be a public nuisance:

(1) The repetitious introduction into interstate commerce of any adulterated or, except for fresh foods and vegetables, any misbranded food, drug, or cosmetic.

(2) The repetitious dissemination of any false advertisement by radio broadcast, United States mails, or interstate commerce for the purpose of inducing, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, or cosmetics.

(3) The repetitious dissemination of a false advertisement by any means for the purpose of inducing, directly or indirectly, the purchase of food, drugs, or cosmetics in interstate commerce.

(b) In order to avoid multiplicity of criminal prosecutions or libel for condemnation proceedings, the district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, temporary or permanent, any person from continuing any such nuisance. In such injunction proceedings it shall not be necessary to show on the part of such person an intent to continue such nuisance.

(c) Further to avoid multiplicity of libel for condemnation proceedings without impairing the protection of the public or the opportunity for the prompt trial on the merits of alleged violations, the district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to restrain by injunction, as hereinafter provided, the institution of more than one seizure action under section 16 against any product if (1) the alleged violation is one of misbranding only, (2) all current shipments of the article alleged to be misbranded bear the same labeling, (3) such alleged misbranding does not involve danger to health or gross deception, and (4) such misbranding has not been the basis of a prior judgment in favor of the United States in any criminal prosecutions or libel for condemnation proceeding under this act.

(d) Any injunction issued pursuant to paragraph (c) of this section shall be dissolved on motion of the United States attorney, (1) upon the presentation by him of a duly certified judgment of condemnation in a seizure case against such product, or (2) at the expiration of the term of court next ensuing after the term in which such injunction issued, unless the complainant files with the court a duly certified judgment rendered upon a determination of the issue of misbranding, and entered pursuant to section 16 after the issuance of such injunction, or evidence satisfactory to the court of his inability to secure such determination.

[(c)] (e) Violation of any [such] injunction issued pursuant to this section may be summarily tried and punished by the court as a contempt. Such contempt proceedings may be instituted by order of the court or by the filing of an information by the United States attorney; and process of the court for the arrest of the violator may be served at any place in the United States or subject to its jurisdiction.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

SEC. 20. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture upon his request, from time to time, samples of food, drugs, and cosmetics which are being imported or offered for import into the United States, giving notice thereof to the owner or consignee, who may appear before the Secretary of Agriculture and have the right to introduce testimony. If it appears from the examination of such samples or otherwise that (1) any false advertisement of such food, drug, or cosmetic has been disseminated in the United States by the importer or exporter thereof, or any person in privity with him, within 3 months prior to the date such article is offered for import, or (2) such article has been manufactured, processed, or packed under insanitary conditions, or (3) such article is forbidden or restricted in sale in the country in which it was produced or from which it was exported, or (4) such article is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, then such article shall be refused admission.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee and shall cause the destruction of any such article refused admission, unless such article is exported by the consignee within 3 months from the date of notice of such refusal, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may deliver to the consignee any such article pending examination and decision in the matter on execution of a bond as liquidated damages for the amount of the full invoice value thereof together with the duty thereon, and on refusal to return such article or any part thereof for any cause to the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury when demanded for the purpose of excluding it from the country or for any other purpose, said consignee shall forfeit the full amount of the bond as liquidated damages.

(c) All charges for storage, cartage, and labor on any article which is refused admission or delivery shall be paid by the owner or consignee and in default of such payment shall constitute a lien against any future importations made by such owner or consignee.

(d) A food, drug, or cosmetic intended for export [which is not adulterated within the meaning of section 3, paragraph (a); section 4, paragraph (a); or section 5] shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded under this act if it (1) accords to the specifications of the foreign purchaser, (2) complies with the laws of the country to which it is intended for export, and (3) is labeled on the outside of the shipping package with the words "For Export." But if such article is sold or offered for sale in domestic commerce, this paragraph shall not exempt it from any of the provisions of this act.

PUBLICITY

SEC. 21. The Secretary shall cause to be published periodically a report summarizing all judgments, decrees, and court orders which have been rendered, including the nature of the charge and the disposition thereof. The Secretary [shall] may also cause to be disseminated such information regarding food, drugs, or cosmetics as may be necessary to protect against danger to public health or fraud upon the consumer: Provided, That no such information shall be so disseminated regarding any brand of food, drug, or cosmetic before rendition of final judgment in proceedings against it except in cases involving imminent danger to health or gross deception of the consumer.

GENERAL ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 22. (a) The authority to make regulations for the efficient enforcement of this act, except as otherwise provided in this section, is hereby vested in the Secretary.

(b) To aid and advise the Secretary in promulgating regulations for the protection of public health, as contemplated by section 3, paragraphs (a) and (d); section 4, paragraph (b); section 5, paragraph (b); section 7, paragraph (g); section 8, paragraphs (e), (g), (i), and (j); [section 9, paragraph (c);] section 10; and section 12, paragraph (a), a Committee on Public Health is hereby provided which shall consist of five members designated by the President with a view to their distinguished scientific attainment and interest in public health and without regard to their political affiliation.

(c) To aid and advise the Secretary in the promulgation of regulations with respect to food as contemplated by section 7, paragraphs (a), (d), and (e); and section 11, a Committee on Food Standards is hereby provided which shall consist of seven members, three of whom shall be selected from the public, two from the food-producing, -processing, and -manufacturing industry, and two from the Food and Drug Administration. The members selected from the public and the food industry shall be appointed by the President without regard to political affiliation, and the members from the Food and Drug Administration shall be designated by the Secretary.

(d) Whenever the Secretary deems that any regulation contemplated by the provisions of this act enumerated in paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section should be established, he shall so advise the appropriate committee. With the approval of a majority of its members, the committee shall recommend to the Secretary a proposed regulation, and the Secretary shall give notice of the proposal and of the time and place of a public hearing to be held thereon not less than 30 days after the date of such notice. After such public hearing the Secretary is authorized to formulate and promulgate such regulation, but no such regulation shall be promulgated without the approval of a majority of the members of the committee. The regulation so promulgated shall become effective on a date fixed by the Secretary, which date shall not be prior to 90 days after its promulgation, and may be amended or repealed in the same manner as is provided for its adoption: Provided, That regulations setting up exemptions pursuant to section 8, paragraph (e), [and section 9, paragraph (c)] may be promulgated without notice or hearing and shall become effective at such time as the Secretary determines.

(e) The term of office of members of the committees provided by paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section, other than members from the Food and Drug Administration, shall be 5 years, but the terms of office of such members first appointed shall expire at the end of 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 years, as shall be designated by the President in their respective appointments. The President shall designate the chairmen of the committees. No person who is a member of the Department of Agriculture or who has a financial interest in the manufacture, advertising, or sale of any food, drug, or cosmetic shall be eligible to serve on the committee on public health, or as a member from the public on the committee on food standards.

(f) Each committee shall convene at least once each year in the city of Washington at a time to be designated by its chairman, but action by either committee under this section may be taken by the members thereof acting individually without convening in meeting. In each case in which approval by either committee of a regulation is required under this section, the Secretary shall transmit to each member of such committee a transcript of the record of the public hearing held by him. Members of the committees shall be given due notice of, and may sit with the Secretary or his representatives at, all such public hearings relating to the functions of their respective committees. Each committee on its own motion or at the request of the Secretary may advise him of its views on any question concerning the enforcement of this act.

(g) The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture shall jointly prescribe regulations for the efficient enforcement of the provisions of section 20. Such regulations shall be promulgated in such manner and take effect at such time as the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine.

(h) Hearings authorized or required by this act shall be conducted by the Secretary or such officer or employee as he may designate for the purpose. [In formulating regulations under paragraphs (b) and (c) of this section, the findings of fact by the Secretary shall be conclusive if in accordance with law.]

COURT REVIEW OF REGULATIONS

SEC. 23. The district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction, on complaint of any interested person, to restrain by injunction, temporary or permanent, the enforcement by any [officer] officer, representative, or employee of the Department of Agriculture of any regulation promulgated as provided in section 22 if it is shown that the regulation is unreasonable in the light of the facts, arbitrary, or capricious, or not in accordance with law, and that the petitioner [will] may suffer substantial damage by reason of its enforcement: Provided, That [the foregoing shall not] nothing in this section shall be deemed to abridge the right of any person against whom a criminal prosecution or suit for injunction shall have been brought under this act or who shall intervene as claimant in any proceeding of libel for condemnation to plead that the regulation whose violation is alleged as the ground for such prosecution, suit, or libel, is invalid on any of the grounds set forth above.

SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

SEC. 24. If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the constitutionality of the remainder of the act and the applicability thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

EFFECTIVE DATE AND REPEALS

SEC. 25. (a) This act shall take effect [6 months after the date of approval] 12 months after the date of approval. The Federal Food and Drugs Act of June 30, 1906, as amended (U.S.C., title 21, secs. 1–15), shall remain in force until such effective date, and, except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, is hereby repealed effective upon such date: Provided, That [upon the approval of this act and before its effective date] the provisions of section 22 shall become effective on the approval of this act, and thereafter and before the effective date of this act, the Secretary is authorized to (1) conduct hearings and to promulgate regulations under the provisions hereof which shall become effective on or after the effective date of this act as the Secretary shall direct and (2) designate upon the approval of this act foods having common or usual names and exempt such food from the requirements of subdivision (2) of paragraph (f) of section 7 for a reasonable time to permit the formulation, promulgation, and effective application of definitions and standards of identity therefor as provided by sections 11 and 12: Provided further, That the act of March 4, 1923 (U.S.C., title 21, sec. 6; 42 Stat. 1500 ch. 268), defining butter and providing a standard therefor, and the act of July 24, 1919 (U.S.C., title 21, sec. 10; 41 Stat. 271, ch. 26), defining wrapped meats as in package form, shall remain in force and effect and be applicable to the provisions of this act.

(b) The provisions of this act shall not be held to modify or repeal any of the existing laws of the United States except as provided by paragraph (a) of this section.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think it would be unfair to the hundreds of persons who have sweat blood over the bill to let any Senator go from this Chamber with the thought in his mind that nothing more is going to be said or done about it. So far as I am concerned I am going to do everything that is honorable to pass the bill.

There were many objections to the original bill. The great journals, magazines, periodicals, and publications of the country, 144 in number, were united against it. The advertising features have been studied, revised, revamped, and put in form not to weaken the bill but to make sure that its strength shall be maintained, and at the same time no injustice done to those great disseminators of advertising. That is true also of the editorial associations representing the newspapers.

I do not know of any determined opposition to the bill except, I will say in all frankness, from an occasional industry which feels it is adversely affected. I want the bill to pass. The scientific bodies of the country who have studied it want it to pass. The women, through the Federation of Women's Clubs, want the bill to pass. It ought to pass in the interest of the safety and the welfare and the health and the lives of our people.

It is not right that there should be thrown upon the market packages like the one I display to the Senate. Seeing them one is led to believe he is buying a full package of cheese, but when he opens it he finds there is but one thin layer in the box, which is so packed that it looks as if there are three layers.

It is not right that there should be sold without any restraint whatever bottles containing food products such as I display. Here is flavoring put up in a pinch bottle, which looks like a great big full bottle, when as a matter of fact there are only a few drops contained within it.

It is not right that there should be sold a package such as I show you, thought to contain a full ounce or more, when as a matter of fact the packing is so scant that it is not half full.

It is not right that there should be sold cosmetics which are liable to injure people, as in the case of the beautiful young woman whose picture I showed you. Here is a lady whose happiness and features were destroyed by the use of a cosmetic containing harmful ingredients such as those to which I have referred.

Mr. President, I have spent a lifetime in the study of the public health. I have devoted my life to its preservation. Dearer to me than anything politics can offer, and I say it with great respect to the high office I hold, more important than any honor which can come to me, is the public health and the safeguarding of the physical welfare of the people of the country. The bill which we are now considering is formulated to that end.

Senators, the wrath of thousands will come down upon the heads of those who willfully prevent the passage of the bill. If my words mean anything, I say it is a matter of wisdom on the part of Senators that they shall study the bill, perfect it if need be, take out of it any defects which still remain, but permit the enactment into law of a measure which will prolong the lives and promote the happiness of thousands and millions of the population of the United States.

My last word is, so far as I am concerned, that I am going to make every honorable effort to pass the bill. I know of those in higher place than that which I occupy who have the same interest in the measure. Every Senator having in mind the welfare of his wife, his children, his grandchildren, and his great-grandchildren if there be such, is interested in having the measure enacted into law because of what it will do—promote their welfare, maintain their health, and extend their lives.

RETIREMENT OF EMPLOYEES IN CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, sometime ago when the calendar was called, Senate bill 2527, to amend the act of May 29, 1930, for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, was reached. The bill provides simply that the act of May 29, 1930, for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service and in certain positions in the legislative branch of the Government, shall be amended to include all other employees in the legislative branch.

I objected to the consideration of the bill at the time because there are a number of employees in the legislative branch who have passed the age when they could properly, or with justice to themselves, at any rate, accept the provisions of the bill. Since that time the suggestion has been made that the following proviso be added to the bill as an amendment:

Provided, That the provisions of section 2 of said act of May 29, 1930, relating to automatic separation, shall not apply to those employees of the legislative branch to which the provisions of said act are extended by the passage of this act.

Without that proviso certain employees of the legislative branch who have already reached the age at which retirement ordinarily would come about would be automatically retired.

Then the following further proviso has been suggested:

Provided further, That any employee of the legislative branch to whom the provisions of such act of May 29, 1930, are by this act made applicable may elect not to come under such act by giving notice in writing to the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be.

In other words, employees who do not wish to come under the provisions of the act need not do so.

I have submitted these amendments to the employees in question, and I am informed that they will be satisfied with the bill if these two provisos shall be added. I will say to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], who introduced the bill, that I am willing that it shall pass if he is willing to agree to those two provisos.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to agree to them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Without objection, the vote whereby the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed will be reconsidered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was conferring with a fellow Senator. It is my fault that I did not pay attention to the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee. Have the amendments referred to by the Senator been offered?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am about to offer them, if unanimous consent shall be given for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. First the bill should be read by the clerk, in order that we may determine whether unanimous consent shall be given for its consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. I ask that the clerk may read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. 2527) to amend the act of May 29, 1930, for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of May 29, 1930, for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service and in certain positions in the legislative branch of the Government, is hereby amended to include all other employees in the legislative branch.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the provisions of section 2 of said act of May 29, 1930, relating to automatic separation, shall not apply to those employees of the legislative branch to which the provisions of said act are extended by the passage of this act: And provided further, That any employee of the legislative branch to whom the provisions of such act of May 29, 1930, are by this act made applicable may elect not to come under such act by giving notice in writing to the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TAX-EXEMPTION CERTIFICATES UNDER COTTON ACT OF 1934

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a joint resolution which I ask to have read; and I shall follow that with a request for unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 123) empowering certain agents authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to administer oaths to applicants for tax-exemption certificates under the Cotton Act of 1934 was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That any county agent or member of a county committee or community committee of a cotton production control association who is authorized in writing by the Secretary of Agriculture to act as his agent in the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act shall, while he is acting as such agent, have power to administer oaths to persons making applications (if made within the county in which such agent is authorized to act) for tax-exemption certificates under section 6 of the act of April 21, 1934, entitled "An act to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", but no fee or compensation shall be charged or received by any such agent for administering such an oath.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF MUNITIONS—ARTICLE IN WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington Daily News on the sale of munitions.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of Tuesday, May 15, 1934]

UNITED STATES MACHINE GUNS USED BY BOTH SIDES IN GRAN CHACO WAR—LEAGUE OF NATIONS COMMISSION CITES SALES TO WARRING NATIONS IN URGING EMBARGO BY POWERS

By Lee Miller

When machine gun rattles at machine gun in the steaming underbrush of the Gran Chaco, the chances are that the weapons of both Bolivians and Paraguayans may display the legend "Made in America."

Commerce Department records today showed that 127 machine guns have been exported from the United States to Paraguay since November. Bolivia has imported 29 from America since January 1.

Machine guns are only a part of the munitions American firms have sold to these nations that are waging—in the words of a League of Nations commission—a "senseless" as well as "pitiless and horrible" conflict.

EMBARGO IS SUGGESTED

This commission reported that although neither Bolivia nor Paraguay produces any considerable amount of war materials, "both continue to obtain arms and war materials without difficulty." The commission suggested an embargo by the powers on arms exports to the warring countries and on arms transit by the belligerents' neighbor nations.

The machine guns that have gone from this country recently to Paraguay are enough to equip almost four regiments up to the war-time complement of the American Army—that is, a dozen such guns each to the three machine-gun companies in a regiment.

Besides machine guns, for which Paraguay in recent months paid the United States manufacturers $91,000 and Bolivia $16,650, other munitions items appear in the prosaic export charts of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

While the Bureau does not undertake to determine the ultimate use of these items, merely preparing the statistics from ship manifests, there appears little reason to doubt that the jungles of the disputed "green hell" are their final destination.

CARTRIDGES ALSO SENT

Last January $65,705 worth of cartridges were exported from the United States to Bolivia, and in the preceding month, $59,314 worth. Business dropped off in February, last month for which figures are available, to $12,510. Last November Bolivia imported $40,125 worth of explosives from the United States. In March of 1933 she bought from United States manufacturers 232,500 pounds of dynamite for $33,002.

As wars go, none of these items is big. But the United States is believed to provide only a fraction of the supplies for the Chaco war, in which in 1933 alone casualties were estimated at 28,000 dead and twice as many wounded. Manufacturers elsewhere in the world are said to be furnishing the rest of the munitions for this conflict.

Aviation activities have figured prominently in dispatches from the front.

SIZABLE PURCHASES

While no airplane exports to Paraguay are recorded in the last 2 years, Bolivia has been a good customer. Aeronautical exports to Bolivia in the 26 months ending February 28 last, total as follows:

Airplanes, $493,491; airplane engines, $97,466; parachutes and parts, $6,098; aircraft parts and accessories, $91,282.

Along the rutted roads that lead from ammunition dumps to the actual theater of war there may be American-made trucks. Since January 1, 1932, this country has exported 1,273 trucks valued at $928,071 to Bolivia, and 454 trucks worth $181,838 to Paraguay.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the calendar.

The calendar is in order.

SIDNEY REYNOLDS

Mr. McKELLAR. Before we begin with the calendar, I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of Sidney Reynolds to be postmaster at Howard City, Mich., be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Without objection, the first nomination on the calender will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations will be confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, May 17, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from the National Incorporative Board of the Master Workmen of America, Charles Town, W.Va., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 2926) to equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees, to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees, to create a National Labor Board, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the city council of Toledo, Ohio, favoring the passage of the bill (S. 2616) to raise revenue by levying an excise tax upon employers, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from W. B. Hamilton, chairman of the Oil and Gas Committee, West Texas Chamber, San Angelo, Tex., praying for the enactment of Federal oil-control legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

PRODUCTION OF GOLD AND OTHER NONCOMPETITIVE METAL-BEARING DEPOSITS

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, there has been held lately in Salt Lake City, Utah, a prospectors' convention. I have been asked to have inserted in the RECORD and appropriately referred a resolution which they there adopted.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Prospectors Educational Institution in convention assembled in Salt Lake City May 1–9, 1934, resolves that the President of the United States of America be requested to provide an appropriate Federal agency with $100,000,000, or other proper sum, in his discretion, to be used by such agency, upon reasonable safeguards, to assist in bringing gold and other noncompetitive metal-bearing deposits to profitable production, and/or prospecting and developing gold and other noncompetitive metal-bearing deposits and areas directly, or indirectly, or in connection with any other Governmental agency.

Salt Lake City, Utah, May 9, 1934.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to submit favorable reports from the Committee on Foreign Relations approving several treaties, and ask that the accompanying resolutions relating to ratification and adherence be read into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved (two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of executive D, Seventy-third Congress, second session, a treaty of friendship, commerce, and consular rights between the United States and the Republic of Finland, signed at Washington February 13, 1934.

Resolved (two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the adherence by the United States to Executive G, Seventy-third Congress, second session, the convention for the unification of certain rules relating to international transportation by air, signed at Warsaw, Poland, on October 12, 1929, and an additional protocol thereto relating to article 2 of the convention.

Resolved (two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the adherence by the United States to Executive H, Seventy-third Congress, second session, the Antiwar Treaty of Nonaggression and Conciliation, signed at Rio de Janeiro on October 10, 1933, by Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Mexico, Paraguay, and Uruguay, in accordance with article 16 thereof, but subject to a reservation as follows:

In adhering to this treaty the United States does not thereby waive any rights it may have under other treaties or conventions or under international law.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask that the treaties be placed on the Executive Calendar and that the injunction of secrecy be removed therefrom.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaties will be placed on the Executive Calendar and, without objection, will be made public.

The treaties are as follows:

[Senate, Executive D, 73d Cong., 2d sess.]

TREATY OF FRIENDSHIP, COMMERCE, AND CONSULAR RIGHTS WITH REPUBLIC OF FINLAND

The United States of America and the Republic of Finland, desirous of strengthening the bond of peace which happily prevails between them, by arrangements designed to promote friendly intercourse between their territories through provisions responsive to the spiritual, cultural, economic and commercial aspirations of the peoples thereof, have resolved to conclude a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Consular Rights and for that purpose have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America,

Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

The President of the Republic of Finland,

Mr. L. Aström, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Finland to the United States of America,

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers found to be in due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I

Nationals of each High Contracting Party who conform to the laws and regulations of the other Party, shall be permitted to enter, travel, and reside in its territory for the purpose of carrying on trade between the two countries; also for other purposes insofar as entry, travel, and residence is or may be permitted by local law.

The nationals of each of the High Contracting Parties within the territory of the other shall be permitted to engage in professional, scientific, religious, philanthropic, manufacturing, and commercial work of every kind, to carry on every form of commercial activity, to own, erect or lease, and occupy appropriate buildings and to lease lands for residential, scientific, religious, philanthropic, manufacturing, commercial, and mortuary purposes, and generally to do anything incidental to or necessary for the enjoyment of any of the foregoing privileges, upon the same terms as nationals of the state of residence insofar as may be permitted by local law. In no case shall they be accorded less favorable treatment in respect of any of the aforesaid matters than nationals of the most favored nation. They shall be permitted in pursuance of any of the aforesaid activities to appoint representatives, agents, or employees of their choice, subject to the local laws in relation to the immigration of aliens.

The nationals of either High Contracting Party within the territory of the other shall not be subjected to the payment of any internal charges or taxes other or higher than those that are exacted of and paid by its nationals.

The nationals of each High Contracting Party shall enjoy freedom of access to the courts of justice of the other on conforming to the local laws, as well for the prosecution as for the defense of their rights, and in all degrees of jurisdiction established by law.

The nationals of each High Contracting Party shall receive within the territory of the other, upon submitting to conditions imposed upon its nationals, the most constant protection and security for their persons and property, and shall enjoy in this respect that degree of protection that is required by international law. Their property shall not be taken without due process of law and without payment of just compensation.

ARTICLE II

With respect to that form of protection granted by National, State or Provincial laws establishing civil liability for injuries or for death, and giving relatives or heirs or dependents of an injured party a right of action or a pecuniary benefit, such relatives or heirs or dependents of the injured party, himself a national of either of the High Contracting Parties and injured within the territory of the other, shall regardless of their alienage or residence outside of the territory where the injury occurred, enjoy the same rights and privileges as are or may be granted to nationals, and under like conditions.

ARTICLE III

The dwellings, warehouses, manufactories, shops and other places of business, and all premises thereto appertaining of the nationals of each of the High Contracting Parties in the territory of the other, used for any purposes set forth in Article I, shall be respected. It shall not be allowable to make a domiciliary visit to, or search of any such buildings and premises, or there to examine and inspect books, papers or accounts, except under the conditions and in conformity with the forms prescribed by the laws, ordinances and regulations for nationals.

ARTICLE IV

Where, on the death of any person holding real or other immovable property or interests therein within the territory of one High Contracting Party, such property or interests therein would, by the laws of the country or by a testamentary disposition, descend or pass to a national of the other High Contracting Party, whether resident or non-resident, were he not disqualified by the laws of the country where such property or interests therein is or are situated, such national shall be allowed a term of three years in which to sell the same, this term to be reasonably prolonged if circumstances render it necessary, and withdraw the proceeds thereof without restraint or interference, and exempt from any succession, probate or administrative duties or charges other than those which may be imposed in like cases upon the nationals of the country from which such proceeds may be drawn.

Nationals of either High Contracting Party may have full power to dispose of their personal property of every kind within the territory of the other, by testament, donation, or otherwise, and their heirs, legatees and donees, of whatsoever nationality, whether resident or non-resident, shall succeed to such personal property and may take possession thereof, either by themselves or by others acting for them, and retain or dispose of the same at their pleasure subject to the payment of such duties or charges only as the nationals of the High Contracting Party within whose territory such property may be or belong shall be liable to pay in like cases.

ARTICLE V

The nationals of each of the High Contracting Parties may exercise liberty of conscience and freedom of worship within the territory of the other Party. They may, without annoyance of molestation of any kind by reason of their religious belief or otherwise, conduct services either within their own houses or within any appropriate buildings which they may be at liberty to erect and maintain in convenient situations, provided their teachings or practices are not contrary to public morals; and they may also be permitted to bury their dead according to their religious customs in suitable and convenient places established and maintained for the purpose, subject to the reasonable mortuary and sanitary laws and regulations of the place of burial.

ARTICLE VI

Between the territories of the High Contracting Parties there shall be freedom of commerce and navigation. The nationals of each of the High Contracting Parties, equally with those of the most-favored nation, shall have liberty freely to come with their vessels and cargoes to all places, ports and waters of every kind within the territorial limits of the other which are or may be open to foreign commerce and navigation.

ARTICLE VII

Each of the High Contracting Parties binds itself unconditionally to impose no higher or other duties or charges, and no other conditions or prohibitions on the importation of any article, the growth, produce or manufacture of the territory of the other Party, from whatever place arriving, than are or shall be imposed on the importation of any like article, the growth, produce or manufacture of any other foreign country. Nor shall any such duties, charges or conditions affecting importations be made effective retroactively.

Each of the High Contracting Parties binds itself unconditionally to impose no higher or other duties or charges and no other conditions, restrictions or prohibitions on the exportation of any article to the territory of the other Party than are or shall be imposed on the exportation of any like article to any other foreign country.

Nothing in this Treaty shall be construed to restrict the right of either High Contracting Party to impose on such terms as it may see fit, and subject to the sole requirement that there shall be no arbitrary discrimination against the other Party as compared with any other foreign country where similar conditions prevail, prohibitions or restrictions designed to protect human, animal, or plant life and health, or regulations for the enforcement of police or revenue laws of the United States or of Finland relating to imports the importation, transportation, or sale of which is prohibited or restricted, nor shall anything in this Treaty be construed to restrict the measures applicable in either the United States or Finland to seeds of agricultural plants which, on account of their origin, are deemed not to thrive in the territory of the respective countries.

Neither High Contracting Party shall establish or maintain restrictions on imports from or exports to the territory of the other Party which are not applied to the import and export of any like article originating in or destined for any other country. Any withdrawal of an import or export restriction which is granted even temporarily by one of the Parties in favor of the articles of a third country shall be applied immediately and unconditionally to like articles originating in or destined for the other Contracting Party. In the event of rations or quotas being established for the importation or exportation of articles restricted or prohibited, each of the High Contracting Parties agrees to grant for the importation from or exportation to the territory of the other Party an equitable share in the allocation of the quantity of restricted goods which may be authorized for importation or exportation.

ARTICLE VIII

Merchandise the growth, produce or manufacture of either of the High Contracting Parties, after importation into the territory of the other Party, shall not be subjected to other or higher internal taxes or charges, or to other or higher charges in respect of warehousing or other facilities, than those payable under like circumstances and conditions on like articles of national origin.

ARTICLE IX

Any advantage of whatsoever kind which either High Contracting Party may extend to any article, the growth, produce or manufacture of any foreign country, whether such favored State shall have been accorded such treatment gratuitously or for compensation, shall simultaneously and unconditionally, without request and without compensation, be extended to the like article the growth, produce or manufacture of the other High Contracting Party, from whatever place arriving.

ARTICLE X

The stipulations of this treaty regarding the treatment to be accorded by each High Contracting Party to the commerce of the other do not extend.

(1) to the treatment which is accorded by the United States of America to the commerce of Cuba under the provisions of the Commercial Convention concluded by the United States and Cuba on December 11, 1902, or any other commercial convention which hereafter may be concluded by the United States with Cuba; or to the commerce of the United States with the Panama Canal Zone or with any of the dependencies of the United States or the commerce of the dependencies of the United States with one another under existing or future laws;

(2) to the benefits which either High Contracting Party has accorded, or may accord, to its neighboring states in order to facilitate local traffic;

(3) to the treatment which Finland accords or may hereafter accord to the commerce of Estonia.

ARTICLE XI

There shall be complete freedom of transit through the territory including the territorial waters of each High Contracting Party on routes convenient for international transit to persons and goods coming from or going to, or passing through the territory of the other High Contracting Party, except such persons as may be forbidden admission into its territory or goods of which the importation may be prohibited by law. Persons and goods in transit shall not be subjected to any transit duty, or to any unnecessary delays or restrictions, or to any discrimination as regards charges, facilities, or any other matter.

Goods in transit must be entered at the proper custom house, but they shall be exempt from all customs and similar duties.

All charges imposed on persons and goods in transit shall be reasonable, having regard to the conditions of the traffic.

The provisions of this article do not apply to the Panama Canal or to waterways and canals which constitute international boundaries.

ARTICLE XII

All articles which are or may be legally imported from foreign countries into ports of the territory of the United States or are or may be legally exported therefrom in vessels of the United States may likewise be imported into those ports or exported therefrom in Finnish vessels without being liable to any other or higher duties or charges whatsoever than if such articles were imported or exported in vessels of the United States; and, reciprocally all articles which are or may be legally imported from foreign countries into the ports of the territory of Finland or are or may be legally exported therefrom in Finnish vessels may likewise be imported into those ports or exported therefrom in vessels of the United States without being liable to any other or higher duties or charges whatsoever than if such articles were imported or exported in Finnish vessels.

In the same manner there shall be perfect equality in relation to the flags of the two countries with regard to bounties, drawbacks, and other privileges of this nature of whatever denomination which may be allowed in the territory of each of the Contracting Parties, on goods imported or exported in national vessels so that such bounties, drawbacks and other privileges shall also and in like manner be allowed on goods imported or exported in vessels of the other country.

With respect to the amount and collection of duties or charges on imports and exports of every kind each of the High Contracting Parties binds itself to give to the vessels of the other the advantage of every favor, privilege or immunity which it shall have accorded to the vessels of a third State, whether such favored State shall have been accorded such treatment gratuitously or for compensation.

ARTICLE XIII

No duties of tonnage, harbor, pilotage, lighthouse, quarantine, or other similar or corresponding duties or charges of whatever denomination, levied in the name or for the profit of the Government, public functionaries, private individuals, corporations or establishments of any kind shall be imposed in the ports of the territory of either High Contracting Party upon the vessels of the other, which shall not equally, under the same conditions, be imposed on national vessels. Such equality of treatment shall apply reciprocally to the vessels of the two countries respectively from whatever place they may arrive and whatever may be their place of destination.

ARTICLE XIV

Merchant vessels and other privately owned vessels under the flag of either of the High Contracting Parties shall be permitted to discharge portions of cargoes at any port open to foreign commerce in the territory of the other High Contracting Party, and to proceed with the remaining portions of such cargoes to any other ports of the same territory open to foreign commerce, on the same terms as national vessels and without paying other or higher tonnage dues or port charges in such cases than would be paid by national vessels in like circumstances. They shall be permitted, on the same terms as national vessels, to load in like manner at different ports in the same voyage outward.

Exceptions, however, shall be made to the provisions of this Article and other provisions of this treaty in regard to

(1) coasting trade (cabotage), respecting which the High Contracting Parties shall concede to each other the most-favored-nation treatment;

(2) traffic in natural or artificial inland waterways, not ordinarily navigable by transoceanic vessels, provided, however, that in regard to such traffic each High Contracting Party will grant to the other most-favored-nation treatment; and provided further, that such vessels of one of the High Contracting Parties as may be permitted to engage in traffic on inland waterways of the other, and the cargoes of such vessels, shall be subject to no other or higher charges than national vessels and their cargoes;

(3) it is further understood that without modifying the stipulations of this Treaty, so far as the amount of pilotage fees is concerned, the United States agrees not to claim, under this Treaty, for American ships any special concessions in regard to the employment of Government pilots which the Finnish Government has granted or may grant to Finnish and Swedish ships on voyages between Finland and Sweden confined to the Baltic Sea and its bays north of 59 degrees north latitude, so long as such concessions are not extended to the vessels of any third country;

(4) it is also understood that the United States will not claim, under this Treaty, any benefits which Finland has accorded, or may accord, to Russia in respect of fishing or sealing in its territorial waters in the Arctic Ocean.

ARTICLE XV

For the purposes of this treaty merchant vessels and other privately owned vessels under the flag of either of the High Contracting Parties and carrying the papers required by its national laws in proof of nationality shall be deemed to be the vessels of the Party whose flag is flown both within the territorial waters of the other High Contracting Party and on the high seas.

ARTICLE XVI

Limited liability and other corporations and associations, whether or not for pecuniary profit, which have been or may hereafter be organized in accordance with and under the laws, National, State or Provincial, of either High Contracting Party and maintain a central office within the territory thereof, shall have their juridical status recognized by the other High Contracting Party provided that they pursue no aims within its territory contrary to its laws. They shall enjoy free access to the courts of law and equity, on conforming to the laws regulating the matter, as well for the prosecution as for the defense of rights in all the degrees of jurisdiction established by law.

The right of such corporations and associations of either High Contracting Party so recognized by the other to establish themselves within its territory, establish branch offices and fulfill their functions therein shall depend upon, and be governed solely by, the consent of such party as expressed in its National, State or Provincial laws. If such consent be given on the condition of reciprocity the condition shall be deemed to relate to the provisions of the laws, National, State or Provincial under which the foreign corportion or association desiring to exercise such rights is organized.

ARTICLE XVII

The nationals of either High Contracting Party shall enjoy within the territory of the other, reciprocally and upon compliance with the conditions there imposed, such rights and privileges as have been or may hereafter be accorded the nationals of any other State with respect to the organization of and participation in limited liability and other corporations and associations, for pecuniary profit or otherwise, including the rights of promotion, incorporation, purchase and ownership and sale of shares and the holding of executive or official positions therein. In the exercise of the foregoing rights and with respect to the regulation or procedure concerning the organization or conduct of such corporations or associations, such nationals shall be subjected to no conditions less favorable than those which have been or may hereafter be imposed upon the nationals of the most favored nation. The rights of any of such corporations or associations as may be organized or controlled or participated in by the nationals of either High Contracting Party within the territory of the other to exercise any of their functions therein, shall be governed by the laws and regulations, National, State or Provincial, which are in force or may hereafter be established within the territory of the Party wherein they propose to engage in business.

The nationals of either High Contracting Party, shall moreover, enjoy within the territory of the other, reciprocally and upon compliance with the conditions there imposed, such rights and privileges as have been or may hereafter be accorded the nationals of any other State with respect to the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain of the other. It is understood, however, that neither High Contracting Party shall be required by anything in this paragraph to grant any application for any such right or privilege if at the time such application is presented the granting of all similar applications shall have been suspended or discontinued.

ARTICLE XVIII

Commercial travelers representing manufacturers, merchants and traders domiciled in the territory of either High Contracting Party shall on their entry into and sojourn in the territory of the other Party and on their departure therefrom be accorded the most-favored-nation treatment in respect of customs and other privileges and of all charges and taxes of whatever denomination applicable to them or their samples.

Commercial travelers, for the purpose of this article, shall be understood to include representatives of commercial concerns who are traveling for the purpose of soliciting orders.

Either High Contracting Party may require, as a condition for granting the pivileges mentioned in Paragraph 1 of this article, the presentation of an authentic document establishing the identity and authority of the commercial traveler. For this purpose any of the following documents, issued in the country where the commercial concern represented is domiciled, shall be accepted as satisfactory to the authorities of the country of destination:

a) a certificate issued by the official authority designated for the purpose;

b) a certificate issued by a Chamber of Commerce, or

c) a signed statement, issued by the concern or concerns represented, in which case it may be required to be certified by a consular officer of the country of destination.

ARTICLE XIX

Each of the High Contracting Parties agrees to receive from the other, consular officers in those of its ports, places and cities, where it may be convenient and which are open to consular representatives of any foreign country.

Consular officers of each of the High Contracting Parties shall, after entering upon their duties, enjoy reciprocally in the territory of the other all the rights, privileges, exemptions and immunities which are enjoyed by officers of the same grade of the most favored nation. As official agents, such officers shall be entitled to the high consideration of all officials, national or local, with whom they have official intercourse in the state which receives them.

The Government of each of the High Contracting Parties shall furnish free of charge the necessary exequatur of such consular officers of the other as present a regular commission signed by the chief executive of the appointing state and under its great seal; and they shall issue to a subordinate or substitute consular officer duly appointed by an accepted superior consular officer with the approbation of his Government, or by any other competent officer of that Government, such documents as according to the laws of the respective countries shall be requisite for the exercise by the appointee of the consular function. On the exhibition of an exequatur, or other document issued in lieu thereof to such subordinate, such consular officer shall be permitted to enter upon his duties and to enjoy the rights, privileges and immunities granted by this treaty.

ARTICLE XX

Consular officers, nationals of the state by which they are appointed, shall be exempt from arrest except when charged with the commission of offenses locally designated as crimes and subjecting the individual guilty thereof to punishment as a criminal. Such officers shall be exempt from military billetings and from service of any military or naval, administrative or police character whatsoever.

In criminal cases the attendance at the trial by a consular officer as a witness may be demanded by the prosecution or defense. The demand shall be made with all possible regard for the consular dignity and the duties of the office; and there shall be compliance on the part of the consular officer.

Consular officers shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts in the state which receives them in civil cases, subject to the proviso, however, that when the officer is a national of the state which appoints him and is engaged in no private occupation for gain, his testimony shall be taken orally or in writing at his residence or office and with due regard for his convenience. The officer should, however, voluntarily give his testimony at the trial whenever it is possible to do so without serious interference with his official duties.

ARTICLE XXI

Consular officers, including employees in a consulate, nationals of the State by which they are appointed other than those engaged in private occupations for gain within the State where they exercise their functions shall be exempt from all taxes, National, State, Provincial, and Municipal, levied upon their persons or upon their property, except taxes levied on account of the possession or ownership of immovable property situated in, or income derived from property of any kind situated or belonging within the territory of the State within which they exercise their functions. All consular officers and employees, nationals of the State appointing them shall be exempt from the payment of taxes on the salary, fees or wages received by them in compensation for their consular services.

The Government of each High Contracting Party shall have the right to acquire and own land and buildings required for diplomatic or consular premises in the territory of the other High Contracting Party and also to erect buildings in such territory for the purposes stated subject to local building regulations.

Lands and buildings situated in the territory of either High Contracting Party, of which the other High Contracting Party is the legal or equitable owner and which are used exclusively for governmental purposes by that owner, shall be exempt from taxation of every kind, National, State, Provincial and Municipal, other than assessments levied for services or local public improvements by which the premises are benefited.

ARTICLE XXII

Consular officers may place over the outer door of their respective offices the arms of their State with an appropriate inscription designating the official office. Such officers may also hoist the flag of their country on their offices including those situated in the capitals of the two countries. They may likewise hoist such flag over any boat or vessel employed in the exercise of the consular function.

The consular offices and archives shall at all times be inviolable. They shall under no circumstances be subjected to invasion by any authorities of any character within the country where such offices are located. Nor shall the authorities under any pretext make any examination or seizure of papers or other property deposited within a consular office. Consular offices shall not be used as places of asylum. No consular officer shall be required to produce official archives in court or testify as to their contents.

Upon the death, incapacity, or absence of a consular officer having no subordinate consular officer at his post, secretaries or chancellors, whose official character may have previously been made known to the government of the State where the consular function was exercised, may temporarily exercise the consular function of the deceased or incapacitated or absent consular officer; and while so acting shall enjoy all the rights, prerogatives and immunities granted to the incumbent.

ARTICLE XXIII

Consular officers, nationals of the State by which they are appointed, may, within their respective consular districts, address the authorities, National, State, Provincial or Municipal, for the purpose of protecting their countrymen in the enjoyment of their rights accruing by treaty or otherwise. Complaint may be made for the infraction of those rights. Failure upon the part of the proper authorities to grant redress or to accord protection may justify interposition through the diplomatic channel, and in the absence of a diplomatic representative, a consul general or the consular officer stationed at the capital may apply directly to the government of the country.

ARTICLE XXIV

Consular officers may, in pursuance of the laws of their own country, take, at any appropriate place within their respective districts, the depositions of any occupants of vessels of their own country, or of any national of, or of any person having permanent residence within the territory of, their own country. Such officers may draw up, attest, certify and authenticate unilateral acts, deeds and testamentary dispositions of their countrymen, and also contracts to which a countryman is a party. They may draw up, attest, certify and authenticate written instruments of any kind purporting to express or embody the conveyance or encumbrance of property of any kind within the territory of the State by which such officers are appointed, and unilateral acts, deeds, testamentary dispositions and contracts relating to property situated, or business to be transacted within, the territory of the State by which they are appointed, embracing unilateral acts, deeds, testamentary dispositions or agreements executed solely by nationals of the State within which such officers exercise their functions.

Instruments and documents thus executed and copies and translations thereof, when duly authenticated under his official seal by the consular officer shall be received as evidence in the territories of the contracting parties as original documents or authenticated copies, as the case may be, and shall have the same force and effect as if drawn by and executed before a notary or other public officer duly authorized in the country by which the consular officer was appointed; provided, always, that such documents shall have been drawn and executed in conformity to the laws and regulations of the country where they are designed to take effect.

ARTICLE XXV

A consular officer shall have exclusive jurisdiction over controversies arising out of the internal order of private vessels of his country, and shall alone exercise jurisdiction in cases, wherever arising, between officers and crews, pertaining to the enforcement of discipline on board, providing the vessels and the persons charged with wrongdoing shall have entered a port within his consular district. Such an officer shall also have jurisdiction over issues concerning the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts relating thereto provided the local laws so permit.

When an act committed on board of a private vessel under the flag of the State by which the consular officer has been appointed and within the territorial waters of the State to which he has been appointed constitutes a crime according to the laws of that State, subjecting the person guilty thereof to punishment as a criminal, the consular officer shall not exercise jurisdiction except insofar as he is permitted to do so by the local law.

A consular officer may freely invoke the assistance of the local police authorities in any matter pertaining to the maintenance of internal order on board of a vessel under the flag of his country within the territorial waters of the State to which he is appointed, and upon such a request the requisite assistance shall be given.

A consular officer may appear with the officers and crews of vessels under the flag of his country before the judicial authorities of the State to which he is appointed to render assistance as an interpreter or agent.

ARTICLE XXVI

In case of the death of a national of either High Contracting Party in the territory of the other without having in the locality of his decease any known heirs or testamentary executors by him appointed, the competent local authorities shall at once inform the nearest consular officer of the State of which the deceased was a national of the fact of his death, in order that necessary information may be forwarded to the parties interested.

In case of the death of a national of either of the High Contracting Parties without will or testament, in the territory of the other High Contracting Party, the consular officer of the State of which the deceased was a national and within whose district the deceased made his home at the time of death, shall, so far as the laws of the country permit and pending the appointment of an administrator and until letters of administration have been granted, be deemed qualified to take charge of the property left by the decedent for the preservation and protection of the same. Such consular officer shall have the right to be appointed as administrator within the discretion of a tribunal or other agency controlling the administration of estates provided the laws of the place where the estate is administered so permit.

In case of the death of a national of either of the High Contracting Parties without will or testament and without any known heirs resident in the country of his decease, the consular officer of the country of which the deceased was a national shall be appointed administrator of the estate of the deceased, provided the regulations of his own Government permit such appointment and provided such appointment is not in conflict with local law and the tribunal having jurisdiction has no special reasons for appointing someone else.

Whenever a consular officer accepts the office of administrator of the estate of a deceased countryman, he subjects himself as such to the jurisdiction of the tribunal or other agency making the appointment for all necessary purposes to the same extent as a national of the country where he was appointed.

ARTICLE XXVII

Each of the High Contracting Parties agrees to permit the entry free of all duty and without examination of any kind, of all furniture, equipment and supplies intended for official use in the consular offices of the other, and to extend to such consular officers of the other and their families and suites as are its nationals, the privilege of entry free of duty of their baggage and all other personal property, whether accompanying the officer to his post or imported at any time during his incumbency thereof; provided, nevertheless, that no article, the importation of which is prohibited by the law of either of the High Contracting Parties, may be brought into its territory.

It is understood, however, that this privilege shall not be extended to consular officers who are engaged in any private occupation for gain in the countries to which they are accredited, save with respect to governmental supplies.

ARTICLE XXVIII

All proceedings relative to the salvage of vessels of either High Contracting Party wrecked upon the coasts of the other shall be directed by the Consular Officer of the country to which the vessel belongs and within whose district the wreck may have occurred. Pending the arrival of such officer, who shall be immediately informed of the occurrence, the local authorities shall take all necessary measures for the protection of persons and the preservation of wrecked property. The local authorities shall not otherwise interfere than for the maintenance of order, the protection of the interests of the salvors, if these do not belong to the crews that have been wrecked, and to carry into effect the arrangements made for the entry and exportation of the merchandise saved. It is understood that such merchandise is not to be subjected to any custom house charges, unless it be intended for consumption in the country where the wreck may have taken place.

The intervention of the local authorities in these different cases shall occasion no expense of any kind, except such as may be caused by the operations of salvage and the preservation of the goods saved, together with such as would be incurred under similar circumstances by vessels of the nation.

ARTICLE XXIX

A consular officer of either High Contracting Party may in behalf of his non-resident countrymen, and without being required to produce his authorization, collect and receipt for their distributive shares derived from estates in process of probate or accruing under the provisions of so-called Workmen's Compensation Laws or other like statutes provided he remit any funds so received through the appropriate agencies of his Government to the proper distributees, and provided further that he furnish to the authority or agency making distribution through him reasonable evidence of such remission.

ARTICLE XXX

A consular officer of either High Contracting Party shall have the right to inspect within the ports of the other High Contracting Party within his consular district, the private vessels of any flag destined or about to clear for ports of the country appointing him in order to observe the sanitary conditions and measures taken on board such vessels, and to be enabled thereby to execute intelligently bills of health and other documents required by the laws of his country, and to inform his Government concerning the extent to which its sanitary regulations have been observed at ports of departure by vessels destined to its ports, with a view to facilitating entry of such vessels therein; provided however, that in respect of vessels of any country other than the High Contracting Parties, the Government concerned does not object.

ARTICLE XXXI

Except as otherwise provided in this treaty, the provisions thereof shall apply to all territories under the sovereignty and authority of each of the High Contracting Parties. It is understood, however, that they shall not apply to the Panama Canal Zone.

ARTICLE XXXII

The present Treaty shall be ratified and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Washington. The Treaty shall take effect in all its provisions thirty days from the date of the exchange of ratifications and shall remain in full force for the term of one year thereafter.

If within six months before the expiration of the aforesaid period of one year neither High Contracting Party notifies to the other an intention of modifying by change or omission, any of the provisions of any of the Articles in this Treaty or of terminating it upon the expiration of the aforesaid period, the Treaty shall remain in full force and effect indefinitely after the aforesaid period subject always to termination on a notice of six months.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty and have affixed their seals thereto.

Done in duplicate, each in the English and Finnish languages both authentic, at Washington, D.C., this thirteenth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four.

PROTOCOL

At the moment of signing the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Consular Rights between the United States of America and the Republic of Finland, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries duly authorized by their respective Governments have agreed as follows:

1) Wherever the term "consular officer" is used in this Treaty it shall be understood to mean Consuls General, Consuls, Vice Consuls and Consular Agents to whom an exequatur or other document of recognition has been issued pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 3 of Article XIX, provided however that the customs courtesies accorded to consular officers under Article XXVII shall apply to consular officers en route to their post for the first time, prior to the receipt of an exequatur.

2) Upon entering into force of the accompanying Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and Consular Rights, the Agreement effected by exchange of notes between the United States and Finland, signed at Washington, D.C., on May 2, 1925, and also the Agreement effected by exchange of notes between the United States and Finland, signed at Washington, D.C., on December 21, 1925, shall cease to be operative.

In faith whereof the undersigned Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Protocol and affixed thereto their respective seals.

Done in duplicate each in the English and Finnish languages, both authentic, at Washington, D.C., the thirteenth day of February, 1934.

CONVENTION FOR THE UNIFICATION OF CERTAIN RULES RELATING TO INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORTATION BY AIR

The President of the German Reich, the Federal President of the Republic of Austria, His Majesty the King of the Belgians, the President of the United States of Brazil, His Majesty the King of the Bulgarians, the President of the Nationalist Government of China, His Majesty the King of Denmark and Iceland, His Majesty the King of Egypt, His Majesty the King of Spain, the Chief of State of the Republic of Estonia, the President of the Republic of Finland, the President of the French Republic, His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, the President of the Hellenic Republic, His Most Serene Highness the Regent of the Kingdom of Hungary, His Majesty the King of Italy, His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, the President of the Republic of Latvia, Her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess of Luxembourg, the President of the United Mexican States, His Majesty the King of Norway, Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, the President of the Republic of Poland, His Majesty the King of Rumania, His Majesty the King of Sweden, the Swiss Federal Council, the President of the Czechoslovak Republic, the Central Executive Committee of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the President of the United States of Venezuela, His Majesty the King of Yugoslavia:

Having recognized the advantage of regulating in a uniform manner the conditions of international transportation by air in respect of the documents used for such transportation and of the liability of the carrier, have nominated to this end their respective Plenipotentiaries, who, being thereto duly authorized, have concluded and signed the following Convention:

CHAPTER I. SCOPE—DEFINITIONS

(1) This Convention shall apply to all international transportation of persons, baggage, or goods performed by aircraft for hire. It shall apply equally to gratuitous transportation by aircraft performed by an air transportation enterprise.

(2) For the purposes of this Convention the expression "international transportation" shall mean any transportation in which, according to the contract made by the parties, the place of departure and the place of destination, whether or not there be a break in the transportation or a transshipment, are situated either within the territories of two High Contracting Parties, or within the territory of a single High Contracting Party, if there is an agreed stopping place within a territory subject to the sovereignty, suzerainty, mandate or authority of another Power, even though that Power is not a party to the Convention. Transportation without such an agreed stopping place between territories subject to the sovereignty, suzerainty, mandate or authority of the same High Contracting Party shall not be deemed to be international for the purposes of this Convention.

(3) Transportation to be performed by several successive air carriers shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Convention, to be one undivided transportation, if it has been regarded by the parties as a single operation, whether it has been agreed upon under the form of a single contract or of a series of contracts, and it shall not lose its international character merely because one contract or a series of contracts is to be performed entirely within a territory subject to the sovereignty, suzerainty, mandate, or authority of the same High Contracting Party.

(1) This Convention shall apply to transportation performed by the State or by legal entities constituted under public law provided it falls within the conditions laid down in Article 1.

(2) This Convention shall not apply to transportation performed under the terms of any international postal Convention.

CHAPTER II. TRANSPORTATION DOCUMENTS—SECTION 1—PASSENGER TICKETS

ARTICLE 3

(1) For the transportation of passengers the carrier must deliver a passenger ticket which shall contain the following particulars:

(a) The place and date of issue;

(b) The place of departure and of destination;

(c) The agreed stopping places, provided that the carrier may reserve the right to alter the stopping places in case of necessity, and that if he exercises that right, the alteration shall not have the effect of depriving the transportation of its international character;

(d) The name and address of the carrier or carriers;

(e) A statement that the transportation is subject to the rules relating to liability established by this Convention.

(2) The absence, irregularity, or loss of the passenger ticket shall not affect the existence or the validity of the contract of transportation, which shall none the less be subject to the rules of this Convention. Nevertheless, if the carrier accepts a passenger without a passenger ticket having been delivered he shall not be entitled to avail himself of those provisions of this Convention which exclude or limit his liability.

SECTION 2. BAGGAGE CHECK

(1) For the transportation of baggage, other than small personal objects of which the passenger takes charge himself, the carrier must deliver a baggage check.

(2) The baggage check shall be made out in duplicate, one part for the passenger and the other part for the carrier.

(3) The baggage check shall contain the following particulars:

(a) The place and date of issue;

(b) The place of departure and of destination;

(c) The name and address of the carrier or carriers;

(d) The number of the passenger ticket;

(e) A statement that delivery of the baggage will be made to the bearer of the baggage check;

(f) The number and weight of the packages;

(g) The amount of the value declared in accordance with Article 22 (2);

(h) A statement that the transportation is subject to the rules relating to liability established by this Convention.

(4) The absence, irregularity or loss of the baggage check shall not affect the existence or the validity of the contract of transportation which shall none the less be subject to the rules of this Convention. Nevertheless, if the carrier accepts baggage without a baggage check having been delivered, or if the baggage check does not contain the particulars set out at (d), (f), and (h) above, the carrier shall not be entitled to avail himself of those provisions of the Convention which exclude or limit his liability.

SECTION 3. AIR WAYBILL

(1) Every carrier of goods has the right to require the consignor to make out and hand over to him a document called an "air waybill"; every consignor has the right to require the carrier to accept this document.

(2) The absence, irregularity, or loss of this document shall not affect the existence or the validity of the contract of transportation which shall, subject to the provisions of Article 9, be none the less governed by the rules of this Convention.

(1) The air waybill shall be made out by the consignor in three original parts and be handed over with the goods.

(2) The first part shall be marked "for the carrier", and shall be signed by the consignor. The second part shall be marked "for the consignee"; it shall be signed by the consignor and by the carrier and shall accompany the goods. The third part shall be signed by the carrier and handed by him to the consignor after the goods have been accepted.

(3) The carrier shall sign on acceptance of the goods.

(4) The signature of the carrier may be stamped; that of the consignor may be printed or stamped.

(5) If, at the request of the consignor, the carrier makes out the air waybill, he shall be deemed, subject to proof to the contrary, to have done so on behalf of the consignor.

ARTICLE 7

The carrier of goods has the right to require the consignor to make out separate waybills when there is more than one package.

ARTICLE 8

The air waybill shall contain the following particulars:

(a) The place and date of its execution;

(b) The place of departure and of destination;

(c) The agreed stopping places, provided that the carrier may reserve the right to alter the stopping places in case of necessity, and that if he exercises that right the alteration shall not have the effect of depriving the transportation of its international character;

(d) The name and address of the consignor;

(e) The name and address of the first carrier;

(f) The name and address of the consignee, if the case so requires;

(g) The nature of the goods;

(h) The number of packages, the method of packing, and the particular marks or numbers upon them;

(i) The weight, the quantity, the volume, or dimensions of the goods;

(j) The apparent condition of the goods and of the packing;

(k) The freight, if it has been agreed upon, the date and place of payment, and the person who is to pay it;

(l) If the goods are sent for payment on delivery, the price of the goods, and, if the case so requires, the amount of the expenses incurred;

(m) The amount of the value declared in accordance with Article 22 (2);

(n) The number of parts of the air waybill;

(o) The documents handed to the carrier to accompany the air waybill;

(p) The time fixed for the completion of the transportation and a brief note of the route to be followed, if these matters have been agreed upon;

(q) A statement that the transportation is subject to the rules relating to liability established by this Convention.

ARTICLE 9

If the carrier accepts goods without an air waybill having been made out, or if the air waybill does not contain all the particulars set out in Article 8 (a) to (i), inclusive, and (q), the carrier shall not be entitled to avail himself of the provisions of this Convention which exclude or limit his liability.

ARTICLE 10

(1) The consignor shall be responsible for the correctness of the particulars and statements relating to the goods which he inserts in the air waybill.

(2) The consignor shall be liable for all damages suffered by the carrier or any other person by reason of the irregularity, incorrectness or incompleteness of the said particulars and statements.

(1) The air waybill shall be prima facie evidence of the conclusion of the contract, of the receipt of the goods and of the conditions of transportation.

(2) The statements in the air waybill relating to the weight, dimensions, and packing of the goods, as well as those relating to the number of packages, shall be prima facie evidence of the facts stated; those relating to the quantity, volume, and condition of the goods shall not constitute evidence against the carrier except so far as they both have been, and are stated in the air waybill to have been, checked by him in the presence of the consignor, or relate to the apparent condition of the goods.

(1) Subject to his liability to carry out all his obligations under the contract of transportation, the consignor shall have the right to dispose of the goods by withdrawing them at the airport of departure or destination, or by stopping them in the course of the journey on any landing, or by calling for them to be delivered at the place of destination, or in the course of the journey to a person other than the consignee named in the air waybill, or by requiring them to be returned to the airport of departure. He must not exercise this right of disposition in such a way as to prejudice the carrier or other consignors, and he must repay any expenses occasioned by the exercise of this right.

(2) If it is impossible to carry out the orders of the consignor the carrier must so inform him forthwith.

(3) If the carrier obeys the orders of the consignor for the disposition of the goods without requiring the production of the part of the airway bill delivered to the latter, he will be liable, without prejudice to his right of recovery from the consignor, for any damage which may be caused thereby to any person who is lawfully in possession of that part of the airway bill.

(4) The right conferred on the consignor shall cease at the moment when that of the consignee begins in accordance with Article 13, below. Nevertheless, if the consignee declines to accept the waybill or the goods, or if he cannot be communicated with, the consignor shall resume his right of disposition.

(1) Except in the circumstances set out in the preceding article, the consignee shall be entitled, on arrival of the goods at the place of destination, to require the carrier to hand over to him the air waybill and to deliver the goods to him, on payment of the charges due and on complying with the conditions of transportation set out in the air waybill.

(2) Unless it is otherwise agreed, it shall be the duty of the carrier to give notice to the consignee as soon as the goods arrive.

(3) If the carrier admits the loss of the goods, or if the goods have not arrived at the expiration of seven days after the date on which they ought to have arrived, the consignee shall be entitled to put into force against the carrier the rights which flow from the contract of transportation.

ARTICLE 14

The consignor and the consignee can respectively enforce all the rights given them by Articles 12 and 13, each in his own name, whether he is acting in his own interest or in the interest of another, provided that he carries out the obligations imposed by the contract.

ARTICLE 15

(1) Articles 12, 13, and 14 shall not affect either the relations of the consignor and the consignee with each other or the relations of third parties whose rights are derived either from the carrier or from the consignee.

(2) The provisions of Articles 12, 13, and 14 can only be varied by express provision in the air waybill.

(1) The consignor must furnish such information and attach to the air waybill such documents as are necessary to meet the formalities of customs, octroi, or police before the goods can be delivered to the consignee. The consignor shall be liable to the carrier for any damage occasioned by the absence, insufficiency, or irregularity of any such information or documents, unless the damage is due to the fault of the carrier or his agents.

(2) The carrier is under no obligation to enquire into the correctness or sufficiency of such information or documents.

CHAPTER III—LIABILITY OF THE CARRIER

ARTICLE 17

The carrier shall be liable for damage sustained in the event of the death or wounding of a passenger or any other bodily injury suffered by a passenger, if the accident which caused the damage so sustained took place on board the aircraft or in the course of any of the operations of embarking or disembarking.

ARTICLE 18

(1) The carrier shall be liable for damage sustained in the event of the destruction or loss of, or of damage to, any checked baggage or any goods, if the occurrence which caused the damage so sustained took place during the transportation by air.

(2) The transportation by air within the meaning of the preceding paragraph shall comprise the period during which the baggage or goods are in charge of the carrier, whether in an airport or on board an aircraft, or, in the case of a landing outside an airport, in any place whatsoever.

(3) The period of the transportation by air shall not extend to any transportation by land, by sea, or by river performed outside an airport. If, however, such transportation takes place in the performance of a contract for transportation by air, for the purpose of loading, delivery or transshipment, and damage is presumed, subject to proof to the contrary, to have been the result of an event which took place during the transportation by air.

The carrier shall be liable for damage occasioned by delay in the transportation by air of passengers, baggage, or goods.

ARTICLE 20

(1) The carrier shall not be liable if he proves that he and his agents have taken all necessary measures to avoid the damage or that it was impossible for him or them to take such measures.

(2) In the transportation of goods and baggage, the carrier shall not be liable if he proves that the damage was occasioned by an error in piloting, in the handling of the aircraft, or in navigation and that, in all other respects, he and his agents have taken all necessary measures to avoid the damage.

ARTICLE 21

If the carrier proves that the damage was caused by or contributed to by the negligence of the injured person the Court may, in accordance with the provisions of its own law, exonerate the carrier wholly or partly from his liability.

ARTICLE 22

(1) In the transportation of passengers the liability of the carrier for each passenger shall be limited to the sum of 125,000 francs. Where, in accordance with the law of the Court to which the case is submitted, damages may be awarded in the form of periodical payments, the equivalent capital value of the said payments shall not exceed 125,000 francs. Nevertheless, by special contract, the carrier and the passenger may agree to a higher limit of liability.

(2) In the transportation of checked baggage and of goods, the liability of the carrier shall be limited to a sum of 250 francs per kilogram, unless the consignor has made, at the time when the package was handed over to the carrier, a special declaration of the value at delivery and has paid a supplementary sum if the case so requires. In that case the carrier will be liable to pay a sum not exceeding the declared sum, unless he proves that that sum is greater than the actual value to the consignor at delivery.

(3) As regards objects of which the passenger takes charge himself the liability of the carrier shall be limited to 5,000 francs per passenger.

(4) The sums mentioned above shall be deemed to refer to the French franc consisting of 65½ milligrams of gold at the standard of fineness of nine hundred thousandths. These sums may be converted into any national currency in round figures.

ARTICLE 23

Any provision tending to relieve the carrier of liability or to fix a lower limit than that which is laid down in this Convention shall be null and void, but the nullity of any such provision shall not involve the nullity of the whole contract, which shall remain subject to the provisions of this Convention.

ARTICLE 24

(1) In the cases covered by Articles 18 and 19 any action for damages, however founded, can only be brought subject to the conditions and limits set out in this Convention.

(2) In the cases covered by Article 17 the provisions of the preceding paragraph shall also apply, without prejudice to the questions as to who are the persons who have the right to bring suit and what are their respective rights.

(1) The carrier shall not be entitled to avail himself of the provisions of this Convention which exclude or limit his liability, if the damage is caused by his wilful misconduct or by such default on his part as, in accordance with the law of the Court to which the case is submitted, is considered to be equivalent to wilful misconduct.

(2) Similarly the carrier shall not be entitled to avail himself of the said provisions, if the damage is caused under the same circumstances by any agent of the carrier acting within the scope of his employment.

(1) Receipt by the person entitled to the delivery of baggage or goods without complaint shall be prima facie evidence that the same have been delivered in good condition and in accordance with the document of transportation.

(2) In case of damage, the person entitled to delivery must complain to the carrier forthwith after the discovery of the damage, and, at the latest, within three days from the date of receipt in the case of baggage and seven days from the date of receipt in the case of goods. In case of delay the complaint must be made at the latest within fourteen days from the date on which the baggage or goods have been placed at his disposal.

(3) Every complaint must be made in writing upon the document of transportation or by separate notice in writing dispatched within the times aforesaid.

(4) Failing complaint within the times aforesaid, no action shall lie against the carrier, save in the case of fraud on his part.

ARTICLE 27

In the case of the death of the person liable, an action for damages lies in accordance with the terms of this Convention against those legally representing his estate.

ARTICLE 28

(1) An action for damages must be brought, at the option of the plaintiff, in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties, either before the Court of the domicile of the carrier or of his principal place business, or where he has a place of business through which the contract has been made, or before the Court at the place of destination.

(2) Questions of procedure shall be governed by the law of the Court to which the case is submitted.

(1) The right to damages shall be extinguished if an action is not brought within two years, reckoned from the date of arrival at the destination, or from the date on which the aircraft ought to have arrived, or from the date on which the transportation stopped.

(2) The method of calculating the period of limitation shall be determined by the law of the Court to which the case is submitted.

(1) In the case of transportation to be performed by various successive carriers and falling within the definition set out in the third paragraph of Article 1, each carrier who accepts passengers, baggage or goods shall be subject to the rules set out in this Convention, and shall be deemed to be one of the contracting parties to the contract of transportation insofar as the contract deals with that part of the transportation which is performed under his supervision.

(2) In the case of transportation of this nature, the passenger or his representative can take action only against the carrier who performed the transportation during which the accident or the delay occurred, save in the case where, by express agreement, the first carrier has assumed liability for the whole journey.

(3) As regards baggage or goods, the passenger or consignor shall have a right of action against the first carrier, and the passenger or consignee who is entitled to delivery shall have a right of action against the last carrier, and further, each may take action against the carrier who performed the transportation during which the destruction, loss, damage, or delay took place. These carriers shall be jointly and severally liable to the passenger or to the consignor or consignee.

CHAPTER IV. PROVISIONS RELATING TO COMBINED TRANSPORTATION

(1) In the case of combined transportation performed partly by air and partly by any other mode of transportation, the provisions of this Convention shall apply only to the transportation by air, provided that the transportation by air falls within the terms of Article 1.

(2) Nothing in this Convention shall prevent the parties in the case of combined transportation from inserting in the document of air transportation conditions relating to other modes of transportation, provided that the provisions of this Convention are observed as regards the transportation by air.

CHAPTER V. GENERAL AND FINAL PROVISIONS

ARTICLE 32

Any clause contained in the contract and all special agreements entered into before the damage occurred by which the parties purport to infringe the rules laid down by this Convention, whether by deciding the law to be applied, or by altering the rules as to jurisdiction, shall be null and void. Nevertheless for the transportation of goods arbitration clauses shall be allowed, subject to this Convention, if the arbitration is to take place within one of the jurisdictions referred to in the first paragraph of Article 28.

ARTICLE 33

Nothing contained in this Convention shall prevent the carrier either from refusing to enter into any contract of transportation or from making regulations which do not conflict with the provisions of this Convention.

ARTICLE 34

This Convention shall not apply to international transportation by air performed by way of experimental trial by air navigation enterprises with the view to the establishment of regular lines of air navigation, nor shall it apply to transportation performed in extraordinary circumstances outside the normal scope of an air carrier's business.

ARTICLE 35

The expression "days" when used in this Convention means current days, not working days.

ARTICLE 36

This Convention is drawn up in French in a single copy which shall remain deposited in the archives of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Poland and of which one duly certified copy shall be sent by the Polish Government to the Government of each of the High Contracting Parties.

ARTICLE 37

(1) This Convention shall be ratified. The instruments of ratification shall be deposited in the archives of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Poland, which shall give notice of the deposit to the Government of each of the High Contracting Parties.

(2) As soon as this Convention shall have been ratified by five of the High Contracting Parties it shall come into force as between them on the ninetieth day after the deposit of the fifth ratification. Thereafter it shall come into force between the High Contracting Parties which shall have ratified and the High Contracting Party which deposits its instrument of ratification on the ninetieth day after the deposit.

(3) It shall be the duty of the Government of the Republic of Poland to notify the Government of each of the High Contracting Parties of the date on which this Convention comes into force as well as the date of the deposit of each ratification.

(1) This Convention shall, after it has come into force, remain open for adherence by any State.

(2) The adherence shall be effected by a notification addressed to the Government of the Republic of Poland, which shall inform the Government of each of the High Contracting Parties thereof.

(3) The adherence shall take effect as from the ninetieth day after the notification made to the Government of the Republic of Poland.

ARTICLE 39

(1) Any one of the High Contracting Parties may denounce this Convention by a notification addressed to the Government of the Republic of Poland, which shall at once inform the Government of each of the High Contracting Parties.

(2) Denunciation shall take effect six months after the notification of denunciation, and shall operate only as regards the party which shall have proceeded to denunciation.

(1) Any High Contracting Party may, at the time of signature or of deposit of ratification or of adherence declare that the acceptance which it gives to this Convention does not apply to all or any of its colonies, protectorates, territories under mandate, or any other territory subject to its sovereignty or its authority, or any other territory under its suzerainty.

(2) Accordingly any High Contracting Party may subsequently adhere separately in the name of all or any of its colonies, protectorates, territories under mandate, or any other territory subject to its sovereignty or to its authority or any other territory under its suzerainty which have been thus excluded by its original declaration.

(3) Any High Contracting Party may denounce this Convention, in accordance with its provisions, separately or for all or any of its colonies, protectorates, territories under mandate or any other territory subject to its sovereignty or to its authority, or any other territory under its suzerainty.

Any High Contracting Party shall be entitled not earlier than two years after the coming into force of this Convention to call for the assembling of a new international Conference in order to consider any improvments which may be made in this Convention. To this end it will communicate with the Government of the French Republic which will take the necessary measures to make preparations for such Conference.

This Convention done at Warsaw on October 12, 1929, shall remain open for signature until January 31, 1930.

ANTI-WAR TREATY ON NON-AGRESSION AND CONCILIATION

The states designated below, in the desire to contribute to the consolidation of peace, and to express their adherence to the efforts made by all civilized nations to promote the spirit of universal harmony;

To the end of condemning wars of aggression and territorial acquisitions that may be obtained by armed conquest, making them impossible and establishing their invalidity through the positive provisions of this treaty, and in order to replace them with pacific solutions based on lofty concepts of justice and equity;

Convinced that one of the most effective means of assuring the moral and material benefits which peace offers to the world, is the organization of a permanent system of conciliation for international disputes, to be applied immediately on the violation of the principles mentioned;

Have decided to put these aims of non-aggression and concord in conventional form, by concluding the present treaty, to which end they have appointed the undersigned plenipotentiaries, who, having exhibited their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following:

ARTICLE I

The High Contracting Parties solemnly declare that they condemn wars of aggression in their mutual relations or those with other states, and that the settlement of disputes or controversies of any kind that may arise among them shall be effected only by the pacific means which have the sanction of international law.

ARTICLE II

They declare that as between the High Contracting Parties, territorial questions must not be settled by violence, and that they will not recognize any territorial arrangement which is not obtained by pacific means, nor the validity of the occupation or acquisition of territories that may be brought about by force of arms.

ARTICLE III

In case of non-compliance by any state engaged in a dispute, with the obligations contained in the foregoing articles, the contracting states undertake to make every effort for the maintenance of peace. To that end they will adopt in their character as neutrals a common and solidary attitude; they will exercise the political, juridical or economic means authorized by international law; they will bring the influence of public opinion to bear but will in no case resort to intervention either diplomatic or armed; subject to the attitude that may be incumbent on them by virtue of other collective treaties to which such states are signatories.

ARTICLE IV

The High Contracting Parties obligate themselves to submit to the conciliation procedure established by this treaty, the disputes specially mentioned and any others that may arise in their reciprocal relations, without further limitations than those enumerated in the following article, in all controversies which it has not been possible to settle by diplomatic means within a reasonable period of time.

ARTICLE V

The High Contracting Parties and the states which may in the future adhere to this treaty, may not formulate at the time of signature, ratification or adherence, other limitations to the conciliation procedure than those which are indicated below:

(a) Differences for the solution of which treaties, conventions, pacts or pacific agreements of any kind whatever may have been concluded, which in no case shall be considered as annulled by this agreement, but supplemented thereby in so far as they tend to assure peace; as well as the questions or matters settled by previous treaties;

(b) Disputes which the parties prefer to solve by direct settlement or submit by common agreement to an arbitral or judicial solution;

(c) Questions which international law leaves to the exclusive competence of each state, under its constitutional system, for which reason the parties may object to their being submitted to the conciliation procedure before the national or local jurisdiction has decided definitively; except in the case of manifest denial or delay of justice, in which case the conciliation procedure shall be initiated within a year at the latest;

(d) Matters which affect constitutional precepts of the parties to the controversy. In case of doubt, each party shall obtain the reasoned opinion of its respective tribunal or supreme court of justice, if the latter should be invested with such powers.

The High Contracting Parties may communicate, at any time and in the manner provided for by Article XV, an instrument stating that they have abandoned wholly or in part the limitations established by them in the conciliation procedure.

The effect of the limitations formulated by one of the contracting parties shall be that the other parties shall not consider themselves obligated in regard to that party save in the measure of the exceptions established.

In the absence of a permanent Conciliation Commission or of some other international organization charged with this mission by virtue of previous treaties in effect, the High Contracting Parties undertake to submit their differences to the examination and investigation of a Conciliation Commission which shall be formed as follows, unless there is an agreement to the contrary of the parties in each case;

The Conciliation Commission shall consist of five members. Each party to the controversy shall designate a member who may be chosen by it from among its own nationals. The three remaining members shall be designated by common agreement by the parties from among the nationals of third Powers, who must be of different nationalities, must not have their customary residence in the territory of the interested parties nor be in the service of any of them. The parties shall choose the President of the Conciliation Commission from among the said three members.

If they cannot arrive at an agreement with regard to such designations, they may entrust the selection thereof to a third Power or to some other existing international organism. If the candidates so designated are rejected by the parties or by any one of them, each party shall present a list of candidates equal in number to that of the members to be selected, and the names of those to sit on the Conciliation Commission shall be determined by lot.

ARTICLE VII

The tribunals or supreme courts of justice which, in accordance with the domestic legislation of each State, may be competent to interpret, in the last or the sole instance and in matters under their respective jurisdiction, the Constitution, treaties, or the general principles of the law of nations, may be designated preferentially by the High Contracting Parties to discharge the duties entrusted by the present treaty to the Conciliation Commission. In this case the Tribunal or Court may be constituted by the whole bench or may designate some of its members to proceed alone or by forming a mixed commission with members of other courts or tribunals, as may be agreed upon by common accord between the parties to the dispute.

ARTICLE VIII

The Conciliation Commission shall establish its own rules of procedure, which shall provide in all cases for hearing both sides.

The parties to the controversy may furnish and the commission may require from them all the antecedents and information necessary. The parties may have themselves represented by delegates and assisted by advisers or experts, and also present evidence of all kinds.

ARTICLE IX

The labors and deliberations of the Conciliation Commission shall not be made public except by a decision of its own to that effect, with the assent of the parties.

In the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, the decisions of the commission shall be made by a majority vote, but the commission may not pronounce judgment on the substance of the case except in the presence of all its members.

It is the duty of the Commission to secure the conciliatory settlement of the disputes submitted to its consideration.

After an impartial study of the questions in dispute, it shall set forth in a report the outcome of its work and shall propose to the Parties bases of settlement by means of a just and equitable solution.

The report of the Commission shall in no case have the character of a final decision or arbitral award either with respect to the exposition or the interpretation of the facts, or with regard to the considerations or conclusions of law.

The Conciliation Commission must present its report within one year counting from its first meeting unless the parties should decide by common agreement to shorten or extend this period.

The conciliation procedure having been once begun may be interrupted only by a direct settlement between the parties or by their subsequent decision to submit the dispute by common accord to arbitration or to international justice.

ARTICLE XII

In communicating its report to the parties, the Conciliation Commission shall fix for them a period which shall not exceed six months, within which they must decide as to the bases of the settlement it has proposed. On the expiration of this term, the Commission shall record in a final act the decision of the parties.

This period having expired without acceptance of the settlement by the parties, or the adoption by common accord of another friendly solution, the parties to the dispute shall regain their freedom of action to proceed as they may see fit within the limitations flowing from Articles I and II of this treaty.

ARTICLE XIII

From the initiation of the conciliatory procedure until the expiration of the period fixed by the Commission for the parties to make a decision, they must abstain from any measure prejudicial to the execution of the agreement that may be proposed by the Commission and, in general, from any act capable of aggravating or prolonging the controversy.

ARTICLE XIV

During the conciliation procedure the members of the Commission shall receive honoraria the amount of which shall be established by common agreement by the parties to the controversy. Each of them shall bear its own expenses, and a moiety of the joint expenses or honoraria.

ARTICLE XV

The present treaty shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties as soon as possible, in accordance with their respective constitutional procedures.

The original treaty and the instruments of ratification shall be deposited in the Ministry of Foreign Relations and Worship, of the Argentine Republic, which shall communicate the ratifications to the other signatory states. The treaty shall go into effect between the High Contracting Parties 30 days after the deposit of the respective ratifications, and in the order in which they are effected.

This treaty shall remain open to the adherence of all states.

Adherence shall be effected by the deposit of the respective instrument in the Ministry of Foreign Relations and Worship of the Argentine Republic, which shall give notice thereof to the other interested states.

ARTICLE XVII

The present treaty is concluded for an indefinite time, but may be denounced by one year's notice, on the expiration of which the effects thereof shall cease for the denouncing state, and remain in force for the other states which are parties thereto, by signature or adherence.

The denunciation shall be addressed to the Ministry of Foreign Relations and Worship of the Argentine Republic, which shall transmit it to the other interested states.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries sign the present treaty in one copy, in the Spanish and Portuguese languages, and affix their seals thereto at Rio de Janeiro, D. F., on the tenth day of the month of October one thousand nine hundred thirty and three.

For the Argentine Republic:

(L.S.) CARLOS SAAVEDRA LAMAS,
Minister of Foreign Relations and Worship.

For the Republic of the United States of Brazil:

(L.S.) AFRANIO DE MELLO FRANCO,
Minister of Foreign Relations.

For the Republic of Chile: with the reservations under letters a, b, c, and d of Article V:

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HAYDEN:

A bill (S. 3629) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior and the Arizona State Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a toll or free bridge across the Colorado River at or near Parker, Ariz., within the Colorado River Indian Reservation; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WAGNER:

A bill (S. 3630) to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employees in interstate commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. BAILEY:

A bill (S. 3631) for the relief of E. Jeanmonod (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PATTERSON:

A bill (S. 3632) to amend section 5153 of the Revised Statutes, as amended; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A bill (S. 3633) directing the conveyance of certain lands to the State of Missouri; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 3634) for the relief of Malcolm P. Nash; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 3635) to authorize the reduction of the required distance between liquor distilleries and rectifying plants and to authorize higher fences around distilleries; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GLASS:

A bill (S. 3636) relating to dividends and surplus of national banking associations; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A bill (S. 3637) for the relief of the heirs at law of Barnabas W. Baker and Joseph Baker; and

A bill (S. 3638) for the relief of the heirs of Reuben Ragland; to the Committee on Claims.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, Senate bill 3402 when introduced was referred to the Committee on Finance and in that committee was referred to a subcommittee. The bill related to relief to Government contractors whose costs of performance were increased as a result of compliance with the act approved June 16, 1933, and for other purposes.

Since the bill was referred to the Finance Committee an exactly similar bill—in fact, an identical bill—has been passed by the House of Representatives. In the House the bill was referred to and considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. When the House bill came to the Senate it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I have had an opportunity to consult with the Chairman of the Finance Committee and the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, together with various other members of both committees. We have decided that since the measure is essentially one having to do with legal questions, the reference of the Senate bill should be changed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Finance Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3402) to provide relief to Government contractors whose costs of performance were increased as a result of compliance with the act approved June 16, 1933, and for other purposes, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the bill (S. 2007) to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, relates to their property here in the District of Columbia. The bill was referred upon its introduction to the Finance Committee. It seems to me that it ought to go to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the Finance Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. METCALF submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC ROADS, ETC.—AMENDMENTS

Mr. HAYDEN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 8781) to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide for emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

CONTINUANCE OF GENERAL SURVEY OF INDIAN CONDITIONS

Mr. WHEELER submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 241), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 79, agreed to February 2, 1928, and continued by subsequent resolutions, authorizing the Committee on Indian Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, to make a general survey of the condition of the Indians in the United States, hereby is continued in full force and effect throughout the duration of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

WILLIAM BARTLETT HAEGELE—WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in 1931 my then colleague, former Senator Shortridge, introduced Senate bill no. 2043, a pension bill, which never became a law. With it he filed certain papers, which are in the hands of the Secretary of the Senate. I ask that the Secretary of the Senate be permitted to return the papers then filed in behalf of that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the papers filed with the bill (S. 2043) for the relief of William Bartlett Haegele (72d Cong., 1st sess.) be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CHARGES FOR ELECTRIC POWER—ADDRESS BY FRANK R. M'NINCH

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, night before last the Honorable Frank R. McNinch, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, delivered an address over the radio on the work of that Commission. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Evening Star, Washington, D.C., May 16, 1934]

TEXT OF ADDRESS

The text of Chairman McNinch's speech follows:

I am glad of the opportunity to talk to you on the subject of electric light and power, and want at the outset to express my appreciation of the courtesy of the Radio Forum in giving me this privilege.

Electricity has become so essential to modern society that all are vitally concerned in the problem of making it available at low cost for domestic, agricultural, commercial, and industrial purposes. Any plan to make electricity more universally available and to reduce the cost to the consumer is of very great importance to the whole Nation.

The generation and distribution of electricity is a highly technical art and is too often spoken of in technical and engineering terms, which tend to confuse rather than to inform the average man. Tonight I will put aside the language of the experts and discuss the subject in plain, everyday terms, which, I hope, may give you a practical understanding of some of the problems which directly affect your interests.

THE COMMISSION'S WORK

I realize that the Federal Power Commission is such a relatively new national agency that the scope of its jurisdiction and the field of its activities are not well known, and I shall therefore make a brief statement as to the organization and work of the Commission.

The Federal Water Power Act, which created the Federal Power Commission, was enacted in 1920 during the administration of Woodrow Wilson. Prior thereto President Theodore Roosevelt had in public messages pointed out the necessity for the conservation of the Nation's water-power resources and the development thereof under such legal restrictions and provisions as would protect the people's rights therein. Then followed years of discussion in Congress of legislation designed to prevent private interests from exploiting for purposes of private greed and profit this great national resource. Through successive sessions Members of Congress, Democrats and Republicans alike, fought for the enactment of such a statute as would protect the people's interest, while a power lobby battled against effective legislation. Finally, under the leadership of President Wilson, came a victory for the people through the enactment of the Federal Water Power Act and the creation of the Federal Power Commission.

The first commission was composed of three Cabinet members: the Secretary of War, Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Interior. For 10 years the Commission sought to administer the act, but it was realized that the law could not be adequately administered except by a commission which was free to devote its whole time to this work; and in 1930, upon the recommendation of President Hoover, Congress amended the act and provided a whole-time independent Commission composed of five members.

A BRIEF SUMMARY

Time does not admit of a statement in detail of the jurisdiction and work of the Commission, but it may be summarized briefly as follows:

The Commission is vested with the jurisdiction of granting or denying preliminary permits and licenses for the construction of hydroelectric projects on all navigable waters in the United States and on the headwaters thereof, where the construction of a dam or power plant would affect navigation on the stream below and also on federally owned or controlled lands.

A further duty is to audit, ascertain, and determine the actual legitimate cost of all power projects built under license granted by the Commission. This is known as the determination of the capital investment in such power plant. This is an important function, because the statute further provides that at the expiration of the license the Federal Government shall have the right to recapture or take over any or all of these licensed power plants at the actual legitimate cost or net investment therein. Such recapture plants may thereafter be operated either by the Federal Government or any State, district, or municipality that may desire to operate them.

Furthermore, the determination of the actual cost and the elimination of fictitious and padded values from the capital structures of these licensed plants is of great importance to the people, because the amount of capital investment as determined by this Commission has an important bearing in the determination of fair rates for electric service.

STATE REGULATORY BODIES

But I want to make it clear to you that the Federal Commission has only a very limited jurisdiction over rates, as this rate-making power is vested in the State regulatory commissions. The Federal rate-making power exists only in those States which have not provided a State commission or other body with authority to regulate the rates. All but seven States now have regulatory bodies. Even in States where there is no State authority, the Federal Commission has no jurisdiction over rates if the legislature has delegated such authority to the municipal governing bodies of the State. The practical result is that as to intrastate rates the Federal Commission has only the most limited rate-making power.

As to rates on electricity transmitted across State lines, the jurisdiction of the Commission is also limited, and can only be exercised if the adjoining States which are involved in the interstate transmission of electricity are unable to agree, through their respective State regulatory bodies, in the regulation of such interstate traffic.

The same general principles apply to the regulation of securities issued by the Commission's licensee companies. The Federal Commission's supervisory power over securities applies to its licensees in only 18 States which have not vested such power in a State commission.

One of the most fundamentally important powers vested in the Commission is that of making a comprehensive investigation of the water-power resources of the Nation and the preparation of a plan and program for their economical development, and the relation of such future development to other industries and to our general social and economic advancement. This function has not heretofore been exercised, and in August of 1933 President Roosevelt, by Executive order, directed the Federal Power Commission to make a national power survey and plan of development, and provided funds for this purpose. The Commission is now actively engaged in this work, and substantial progress has already been made by the staff of experts engaged for this special task.

WASTE AND OVERDEVELOPMENT

Heretofore the development of our water-power resources has not been in accordance with any coordinated plan, but instead has been largely controlled and projected by various power industry groups in the development of particular water-power sites. The lack of accurate knowledge of our water-power resources and the absence of a national plan for their economical development to meet the present and future requirements of the various sections of our country have resulted in a waste of these resources in some sections and an overdevelopment in other sections.

In the making of this national power survey the Federal Commission has set out to obtain the essential facts relative to our power resources, the cost of their development, their capacity, the market, present and future, and the effects of such developments upon industry, commerce, and agriculture and the needs and uses for electricity in the homes in cities, towns, villages, and the countryside.

We are not undertaking to prove any particular theory or to establish any preconceived idea or plan. We are making a scientific search for all of the elements involved. We are hewing to the line of facts and letting the chips fall where they will. We have invited and have the assurance of the cooperation of leaders of the privately owned power interests and likewise of the publicly owned power plants. It is believed that with their cooperation and through the independent efforts of our own staff we will be able to assemble all of the essential information necessary to an understanding of our national power resources and their comprehensive and coordinated plan for future development.

DISTRIBUTION COSTS STUDIED

Under a Senate resolution introduced by Senator COSTIGAN, of Colorado, the Commission is also engaged in an investigation and study of the cost of distribution of electricity. This is an important and necessary part of any national power survey. The power industry and State and Federal officials now know what it costs to generate electricity in any particular plant and to transmit it to the substation, but it is safe to say that what it costs to distribute electricity over the network of wires to the meter of the consumer is not accurately known. Knowing as we do the generating and transmission costs under given conditions, if to that is added a substantially accurate knowledge of the cost of distribution, we would then know three of the most important elements entering into the cost of electricity.

To round out and complete this national power program, the Congress recently passed a joint resolution, introduced in the Senate by Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, and in the House by Representative RANKIN, of Mississippi, authorizing the Federal Power Commission to assemble and analyze the electric rates prevailing in every city, town, hamlet, and rural community in America. This is an undertaking of the greatest importance to both the electric light and power industry and to all who use electricity. For as the result of this investigation and analysis of rates the regulatory commissions and the governing bodies of municipalities and even the individual citizen will be able to make intelligent comparisons of the rates being paid in any particular community with the rates prevailing in other communities similarly situated.

It may surprise you to learn that there is no such information now available. The only published compilation of rates is that in the Ratebook of the Edison Electric Institute, an association maintained by the privately owned utility companies. But this Ratebook gives the electric rates only for cities of more than 20,000 population. It covers, therefore, only 3 percent of the 15,500 communities which receive electric service, and omits entirely the rates charged in small towns and for rural service, where the rates are generally much higher than they are in the larger cities. And the rates published in this Ratebook are so complicated and expressed in such technical language and vary so much in their structure that only rate experts can understand them. They bewilder and confuse the ordinary citizen. This matter of rates for electricity is a most vital one, both to the company that sells and to the consumer who buys. The consumer has a right to know that he is paying no more than a fair price, and the producer has a right to know whether the rates in force afford opportunity for a reasonable return on the investment useful and necessary to render such service.

WIDE VARIATION IN RATES

There is a wide variation in the rates charged for electricity throughout the United States. Some private companies and some municipal plants have gone a long way in supplying domestic consumers, as well as commercial and industrial users, with relatively cheap electric service. Other private companies and municipal plants have held to the theory that the higher the rate, the greater the return on the investment, and have therefore resisted attempts to secure rate reductions. These private companies have fought rate reductions in the belief that they were protecting their profits, while many municipal plants have likewise maintained high rates in order to secure large revenues in lieu of taxes.

Experience is teaching, however, that even from the selfish standpoint of assuring large revenues, high rates for electric service is a mistaken policy. It has been shown in many cases that substantial rate reductions, instead of reducing revenues, induce consumers to use more electricity and thus actually increase both the revenues and the profits of the business. There is much evidence to support the view that well-considered rate reductions will mean more certainty of earnings for the power industry and tend toward steadier and more uniform returns for the investors.

There is a very general belief that electric rates are too high, and one of the important items in the program of President Roosevelt for recovery and for the establishment of a new and solider base for equality of burdens and benefits is the making of electricity available at the lowest practicable rates. Electricity should not be an agency for excessive profits for a few, but the common servant of all. It is desired through intelligent planning to put electricity within the means of all of the people for use in the home, store, factory, field, and mine, that burdens may be lifted from the backs of men and women. This social and economic objective the people are determined to achieve. After costly yet enlightening experience, the public is resolved that electric light and power shall no longer be their master, but shall, instead, be their servant.

Electricity should be the inexpensive tool of all men rather than the wheel of fortune of private greed, bent on speculative profit through watered stock and capital investment write-ups and other forms of fictitious values, to make a Roman holiday for a privileged class while innocent investors and consumers are condemned to the role of helpless victims in the arena.

BALANCING THE SCALES

This objective of generally lowered electric rates involves injustice to no one but only the balancing of the scales for everyone. Such a program will deprive no one of property rights but will recognize that the property rights of the consumers are of equal dignity with those of the producers. This policy says with firmness, yet with fairness, to a monopoly selling to a consumer who has but one seller to buy from, "Thus far but no further."

The plan to assure consumers electric power at low cost will not be based upon any visionary theory nor upon any hocus-pocus formula for economic relief but upon a careful analysis and survey of the whole subject. One of the keys that will help unlock the door to low rates is the simple, tried, and demonstrated principle of volume production and increased consumption. In no other industry is there better reason to expect that larger consumption will follow volume production and lowered costs. In no other industry will volume consumption so certainly yield larger returns. No other industry offers greater possibilities for increased production with such relatively small additional capital investment and operating expenses. Once the power plant is constructed, the addition of another generating unit represents a relatively small additional cost. Once the transmission and distribution lines are constructed, the delivery of greater volume of energy to the meters of consumers imposes little or no additional expense for such delivery. These are facts known not only to all who are technically informed on the subject but are now fairly well understood by the man on the street.

May I give you one illustration of the effect of lowered rates upon consumption. The private power company which serves the National Capital is a steam plant whose fuel supply is about 200 miles distant. Ten years ago it was charging the high rate of 10 cents per kilowatt for domestic service. As the result of an agreement between the Public Service Commission and the company, rate reductions have been made each year for 10 years. The result today is one of the lowest schedules for residential use in the United States, ranging from 3.9 cents to 1.5 cents per kilowatt-hour. An analysis of the rate and consumption data shows that every time the rate was reduced the consumption increased. The annual kilowatt consumption per customer was 456, while today it is 868, or almost double. In 1926 the revenue received per customer was $30.68, while the revenue received in 1933 was $31.69, or only $1.01 greater cost to the customer for practically double the volume of electric energy. While most utility stocks have suffered radical declines during the depression, the record shows that the value of the preferred stock in this company has continued without impairment and has today a higher market value then it had in 1926, while the earnings on the common stock have increased from $26.90 to $68.08, all notwithstanding a reduction in rates in the meantime to a point little more than one third of the original rate. Decrease of rates has resulted in increased consumption, increased earnings, and an increased surplus in the company's treasury.

EXPECTS FURTHER REDUCTIONS

I hold no brief for this rate schedule as being ideal, as I am confident yet further reductions will be realized. But this is an illustration of what may be done when there is cooperative effort between the power company and the regulatory authority, and without a waste of energy, time, and money in resisting public regulation.

An illustration in another industry may indicate the practicability of this program. Industrial vision years ago led leaders of the automobile industry in the direction of volume production, and marketing at a reasonable price. This put the automobile within the reach of the average man. It is now the serviceable utility for the millions. Had a short-sighted policy controlled the industry, the automobile today would be the luxury of the few. If the electric-power industry will think constructively of how the millions of potential customers may be made consumers of electricity, and how present consumers may be encouraged to increase their consumption by reduction of rates, I believe it will thus find a larger measure of permanent and deserved prosperity.

The American farm is an almost virgin field inviting the resourcefulness, the ingenuity, and the business ability of the industry to electrify the millions of farms which are now denied this great economic and social agency. Of the 6,250,000 farms in the United States, only 700,000 have utility electric service, while 150,000 have individual lighting plants. This leaves 5,400,000 farms without electricity to light their homes or to relieve the farmer and his family of burdens and drudgery. Here is a great unconquered empire awaiting eagerly the coming of this beneficent agency.

THE HOME APPLIANCE FIELD

Yet another field of opportunity for lowering rates is volume production and distribution of the various useful home appliances, such as refrigerators, ranges, washers, dishwashers, small heat units, and others too numerous to mention. These are available today, but not at prices within the means of the masses. It follows that these appliances are not to be generally found in the humble homes, but only, or chiefly, in the homes of the well-to-do. The wide distribution and use of these appliances would create an enormous additional demand for power and would also serve to equalize social conditions in town and country.

The objective of lower rates is not to be fully obtained by employment of only the means I have thus far indicated, but will also require a thorough house cleaning in those portions of the industry which need it.

Before we may have adequately lowered rates, it is my judgment that the present holding-company system must be subjected to thorough Federal supervision and regulation. Through holding-company control of the operating companies which generate and sell you electricity, and through holding-company control of system service companies, many operating companies are carrying an unjust burden through payment of excessive management, supervision, construction, purchasing, engineering, legal, accounting, and other fees. Some holding companies in this way are taking the cream of the profits collected by the operating companies from the consumers. If this siphoning of profits from operating companies into great pools of profits in distant financial centers is stopped, if this "old man of the sea" is thrown from the back of the operating company, this needed reform would tend to reduce the cost of electricity. I am glad to say that some operating companies have no holding company dominance and pay no tribute through such fees.

Further reforms which would justify lower rates in many instances are the decapitalization of those investment structures which are inflated and include unreal and fictitious elements of so-called "value." These inflated capital structures should be stripped of all except that which represents real money prudently invested.

OBSOLETE MACHINERY ITEMS

In some capital structures there are still to be found large items representing cost of machinery and equipment which are now either obsolete or inefficient. It is neither fair nor right for the public to continue to pay a return on such values. Depreciation reserves have been set up to take care of these items, and it is of course unfair for a company to continue to base rates on such property when in fact it has in its depreciation reserve fund, collected from the consumers, the money which represents these depreciated values.

Lower rates would follow the simple process of hanging these watered capital structures in the sunlight to dry and shrink to their true size in actual cost or depreciated value.

Recent official investigations have shown that the salaries of executives of some companies are excessive and that many of these high salaries were not reduced during the depression, while in a few instances they were actually increased at a time when reduced purchasing or paying capacity of the consumers should have prompted these companies to reduce these top salaries and to otherwise economize in every practical way.

This problem of cheaper electricity is a challenge to the far-seeing leaders of the industry. The Nation is now waiting to see whether the responsible officers and directors of this industry have the vision, the courage, and statesmanship to readjust their policies and methods to the demands of a new public opinion which is demanding a new deal in power. If this industry will recognize that a public utility is a public trust, to be administered primarily in the interest of the consuming public, it will find that there is no war between the investor's dollar and the consumer's dollar, but that the two working together can benefit the producer and consumer alike. They will find in such a policy no threat to the legitimate profit system, but only a denial of any right to exploit the consumers.

Notwithstanding the wrongs and abuses of some false leaders in the past, and which created suspicion and hostility toward the industry, there is evidence of the presence of some leaders in the industry who are thinking in terms of public service. It is hoped these men, like the "saving remnant" of Isaiah, may become the new leaven which will transform the leadership of this great industry and win for it the confidence and the esteem of the American people through cooperation for a new deal and a fair deal in electricity.

AMERICAN RADIO POLICY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on the day before yesterday the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] placed in the RECORD a portion of a statement entitled, "Fundamental Principles Which Should Underlie American Radio Policy", adopted by the National Conference of Leaders in Education, Government, and Civic Affairs. It pertains particularly to the radio, and I ask unanimous consent that the entire statement may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the pamphlet was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES WHICH SHOULD UNDERLIE AMERICAN RADIO POLICY ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF LEADERS IN EDUCATION, GOVERNMENT, AND CIVIC AFFAIRS, WASHINGTON, D.C., MAY 8, 1934

Radio broadcasting, an instantaneous, universal means of communication, reaching literate and illiterate, young and old alike, exerts an inevitable educational influence upon American standards, ideals, and actions. This influence is either good or bad. It either improves or debases American standards. Radio broadcasting—this great, new agency—should be so guided and controlled as to insure to this Nation the greatest possible social values. The social welfare of the Nation should be the conscious, decisive, primary objective, not merely a possible byproduct incidental to the greatest net returns to advertisers and broadcasters.

To promote the greatest general welfare the following principles must be observed:

Listeners' choice: The wholesome needs and desires of listeners should govern the character, the content, and the relative extent and frequency of broadcast programs. Variety sufficient to satisfy the tastes of all groups of effective size should be provided. Material detrimental to the welfare of listener groups should be eliminated regardless of commercial profit. The present operation of commercial stations secures neither a genuine expression of listeners' choice nor an effective fulfillment of that choice.

Minority voice: Responsible groups, even the minorities, should not be debarred from broadcasting privileges because of their relative size, for radio is but the amplification and extension of the individual's free speech and discussion.

Youth protected: Positive, wholesome broadcasts for youth at home and in schools should be provided. The impressionable, defenseless minds of children and youth must be protected against insidious, degenerative influences.

America's best: The control and support of broadcasting should be such that the best obtainable of culture, of entertainment, of information, of statecraft, shall have place on the air available to all the people.

Controversial issues: Discussion of live, controversial issues of general public concern should be encouraged for the safe and efficient functioning of a democracy and should not be denied a hearing because offensive to powerful advertisers or other groups.

If a universal means of communication is to be used for general social welfare, it must be controlled by the people's agency, which is Government. A private organization is incapable of exercising adequate control. This need not imply full Government ownership or operation nor should it preclude governmental units' owning and operating stations. Neither must offensive censorship necessarily follow any more than it does in the post office or the telegraph today. Government must be the umpire.

Finance: If these objectives for a national broadcasting program are to be realized, adequate support must be provided. The individual listeners, whose investment in receiving sets is already 90 percent of the total broadcasting capital, are deserving of the best possible programs. The Government should cease incurring expense for the protection of channels for the benefit of private monopoly without insuring commendable programs satisfactory to citizen listeners.

If general public welfare is to be promoted by radio communication, some specific recommendations immediately present themselves.

Impartial studies: Thorough, adequate, and impartial studies should be made of the cultural implications of the broadcasting structure to the end that specific recommendations can be made for the control of that medium to conserve the greatest social welfare values. These studies should also include: An appraisal of the actual and potential cultural values of broadcasting; the effective means for the protection of the rights of children, of minority groups, or amateur radio activities, and of the sovereignty of individual States; the public services rendered by broadcasting systems of other nations; international relationships in broadcasting.

Appeal to President: We recommend to the conference the appointment of a committee to wait upon the President of the United States to urge that the recommendations of the conference be put into effect by the President.

THE NEW DEAL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which was published in the Chicago Sunday Tribune on May 13 last, entitled "The Tenons and Mortises of the New Deal."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Sunday Tribune, May 13, 1934]

THE TENONS AND MORTISES OF THE NEW DEAL

The Tribune's program for America leads off today with "repeal the tyranny laws."

It is decidedly unpleasant to think of the American Government as revealing the slightest Hitlerite tendency. Whatever may come in the enthusiasm of party controversy or the acrimony of economic and social disputes and conflicts, we all pray to be saved from anything approximating the methods of European political control.

Decent Americans will prefer to avoid even suspicions as long as possible; and the administrators, it is to be hoped, will be equally resolved not to give color to the thought that they may be yielding to temptations urging them to make conspicuous examples of persons who do not follow them in their theories or practices.

Zeal may go a long way in a wrong direction and may even give sanction to questionable procedures. It seems to be time to raise this question in order that it may have prompt consideration both by the administration and by the opposition.

Attorney General Cummings causes a tax complaint against Andrew Mellon to be taken before the Federal grand jury in Pittsburgh. Mellon was charged with evasion of his personal income taxes in his return for the year 1931. The Government presented its case, and the grand jurors refused to indict. The public had no means of knowing the truth, but it must accept the conclusion that the Government could not make its case before its own grand jury. Mr. Mellon, in public statements, said that he could not understand the method of procedure, there being other ways of taking up a disputed point, and he being of the opinion that, so far from evading any taxes, he had overpaid and proposes to seek a return.

The Government has been making some adjustments in rebates of large sums to other wealthy taxpayers and estates. So far as the public knows, Mr. Mellon has taken very little part in the opposition to the Government, but he was a conspicuous member of the previous administration in conflict with much of the "new deal." As the matter stands, he has the better of his controversy with the Government, and Mr. Cummings' procedure in using the grand jury is not fully explained.

The scene presents many pictures of administrators who, in reaching for great extensions of their power to control industry, commerce, and utilities, warn the alarmed citizens whose property and life's work are involved that they must be compliant and not carry their instinctive objections to the point of opposition and obstruction. Secretary Wallace makes plain his indignation that men heavily involved in the handling of farm products should consider organizing to defend their legal rights. The Secretary has withdrawn the trading privileges of Arthur Cutten, the country's best-known grain operator, upon allegations of alleged improprieties years back. Mr. Wallace is seeking arbitrary authority over the prices and costs of food production in legislation which has been scandalized by secrecy and haste.

General Johnson, the blue eagle of industry, although he has his open moments of candid doubt, is pressing for the adoption of the N.R.A. in every State to remove any restrictions preventing the cracking-down upon little fellows in business in every American community, and the fate of these little fellows under joint Federal and State regulation has been vividly illustrated in the New York bread and milk case, the New York tailors' case, and the New Jersey pants presser's fine and imprisonment, with Mr. Wallace continuing along the same line with his star-chamber milk inquisitions and trials.

The administrators who are revolutionizing American life are dispensing with civil liberties, and guaranties, and legal protections such as the right of trial by jury. The victim gets his hearing before his accusers, and their findings virtually terminate his legal resources. His property and his person are at the mercy of the new laws.

The newspaper publishers of the country, who know with what prolonged governmental opposition their demand for freedom of the press was resisted and with what astonishing difficulty they were able to get a guaranty written in their code, are in a position to view the Government's approach to control of communications with just alarm.

The Radio Commission is the present model of the control sought over the wires. Mr. Henning's articles have revealed how arbitrarily politics has dealt with property rights and what influences have prevailed from time to time to favor one applicant and injure another. There have been some conscientious men in the radio control, but there is also a determination to bend this virtually helpless medium of communication to governmental will and make it serve governmental purpose, at its peril if it does not. The channels can be taken away upon any pretext the administrators care to set up, and Mr. Henning has shown how inconsistent one pretext may be with another. Pull and punishment are factors in regulation, and warning has been given that the character of the broadcasts, an admonitory phrase, will establish the eligibility of the licensee. An extension of this system to other means of communications would carry premonitions of the worst sort.

Exchanges and markets, institutions of what the communists distinguish as the bourgeois class, are in a state of constant fear that legislation will cripple if not destroy them. Americans have never consciously classified their normal citizens as bourgeois. The term has been to them, if they thought of it at all, merely a synonym for democracy, the society of the average citizen going his free way within the law to earn his living in pursuits which he chose for himself. All the institutions of this free society are now uncertain of their future, and some consciousness is arising that bourgeois is taking on in Washington the meaning it has in Moscow.

When the Government selects a judge such as Judge Wilkerson, a capitalist such as Mellon, a trader such as Cutten, a tailor such as Maged, a milk dealer such as Nebbia in New York or such as Shissler in Illinois for impeachment, loss of privileges, grand jury investigation, juryless prosecution or star chamber trial, a suspicion that the shadow of Hitler is on the governmental wall is hard to dismiss.

Single and isolated acts of government may not contain the full meaning; but when they are pieces which may be put into a mosaic within which then is found a distinct picture or pattern, the conclusion that there are purpose and design revealed by the composite is not one easily put out of mind.

A historic parallel may be found illustrated in a celebrated speech of Abraham Lincoln when, after the Dred Scott decision, he accepted the nomination of Illinois Republicans to run against Stephen Douglas for the United States Senate. To explain his reference, Stephen was Douglas, Franklin was Franklin Pierce, Roger was Roger Taney, and James was James Buchanan. Douglas had said that the Supreme Court must decide whether the people of a Territory could prohibit slavery. Franklin Pierce in his last message had said that the compromise was unconstitutional. Buchanan in his inaugural had exhorted the people to abide by the decision, whatever it might be, and Taney had written the Supreme Court opinion saying that the Missouri compromise was unconstitutional and that Congress could not prohibit slavery in territories over which it had jurisdiction. In the opinions of these four Democrats Lincoln found a political prearrangement to destroy the compromise in which the slavery question had been tranquilized. The following is his comment:

"We cannot absolutely know that all these exact adaptations are the result of preconcert. But when we see a lot of framed timbers, different portions of which we know have been gotten out at different times and places and by different workmen—Stephen, Franklin, Roger, and James, for instance—and when we see these timbers joined together and see they exactly make the frame of a house or a mill, all the tenons and mortises exactly fitting and all the lengths and proportions of the different pieces exactly adapted to their respective places, and not a piece too many or too few—not omitting even scaffolding—or, if a single piece be lacking, we see the place in the frame exactly fitted and prepared yet to bring such piece in—in such a case we find it impossible not to believe that Stephen, and Franklin, and Roger, and James all understood one another from the beginning, and all worked upon a common plan or draft drawn up before the first blow was struck."

Are we seeing the tenons and mortises which exactly fit in the new framed house of government?

One conclusive answer would be found in the repeal of the laws in whose operation tyranny may entrench itself.

A SILVER POLICY—ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "A Silver Policy", written by Walter Lippmann, which was published in the New York Herald Tribune.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, May 15, 1934]

A SILVER POLICY

By Walter Lippmann

There are many men who believe that the best silver policy would be to ignore silver and to do nothing about it. They would like the President to resist the silver Senators in the belief that the agitation will die down. They recall that Bryanism died down after the Republican victory of 1896 and that for more than 30 years thereafter silver was not an issue in American politics. They believe that the same chain of events would take place today if Mr. Roosevelt would imitate Cleveland, would stand by gold alone, and would, if necessary, let his party be split on the silver issue as Cleveland's was.

History does not repeat itself quite so regularly as that. And if we look at the whole history of the silver agitation in the United States from 1873 to the present day, we can see, I believe, why the events of 1896 are not likely to repeat themselves. The first big silver movement ran its course between 1873, when silver was demonetized, and 1896, when Bryan was defeated. This was a period of falling prices throughout the world, and within that period the United States had two very severe and long depressions and some minor ones.

Most of us who grew up in a Republican atmosphere have been taught to believe that the recovery after 1896 and the prosperity which followed were due to the victory of sound gold money in the McKinley campaign. No doubt the ending of monetary uncertainty was a good thing. But it may be seriously doubted whether the nonpartisan historians would agree today that it was McKinley's victory which ended the uncertainty that had prevailed for more than 20 years, or that it was the Republican Party which made sound money sound. The best historical opinion today is, I believe, that it was not McKinley and Bryan who settled the silver question after 1896, but the opening of the South African gold mines and the invention of new processes for the mining of gold. In this view it was the unexpected abundance of gold at the turn of the century which ended the silver movement of that era by reducing the purchasing power of the gold dollar.

If that is the true view of the past, then the present silver movement is not likely to subside unless for one reason or another gold again falls in value and world prices rise once more. Now the fact is that gold is not falling in value. Even if the world gold supply is sufficient, as some experts think it is, the supply is hoarded and sterilized practically everywhere. The gold that has been coming out of the mines and out of the hoards of India is promptly buried again in the central banks and in private vaults.

As long as this condition exists, the silver agitation will not only not subside but will become more intense. For what does this hoarding of gold mean? It means that an immense part of the world's purchasing power, all the value represented by the sterilized gold plus all the credit that could be built on the gold, is withheld from the markets for goods and from investments and is frozen into inert gold bars that lie underground in Paris, New York, Washington, London, and elsewhere.

The need of the world is to release this purchasing power that has taken refuge in gold and is captive there. This means that the gold hoarders of the world, the governments, the central banks, the individuals frightened by the deflation of the past years, must somehow be induced to believe that it is safer and more profitable to sell gold and to buy things. The way to induce them to believe this is to show them that gold itself is depreciating while other things are appreciating; that if they cling to gold they will grow poorer, whereas for the past 5 years the one investment that was sure to be profitable was in gold.

The silver movement has no importance except as one means to accomplish this result. There is no more point in buying silver for its own sake than there is in buying coffee or peanuts or scrap iron. The silver producers are entitled to no better treatment than any other group of producers. For that reason a mere proposal to purchase silver and then store it in the Treasury vaults would be of no general interest. Unless silver is used to break up the world-wide corner in hoarded and sterilized gold, there is no true silver policy. There is merely a subsidy to the silver interests.

That is why the recent proposal of the silver bloc that there be a declaration of policy reestablishing silver as reserve money is of such great interest. A declaration of this sort would serve notice upon the whole world that the weight of the United States would be exerted to depress the value of gold. For if silver becomes basic money in the United States, it means that the United States is making silver interchangeable with gold, not necessarily at a fixed ratio and preferably not at a fixed ratio, but at the ratio which it determines it most likely from time to time to make gold cheaper and thereafter to keep it reasonably stable.

Thus an effective silver policy would require a mandatory declaration by Congress that silver was in fact an equivalent for gold. A prudent silver policy would require that the President should be free to decide at what price he will buy and sell silver. The mandatory declaration is desirable, because it is the most convincing way to make plain to the whole world that a rival for gold has been created by the nation which has the resources needed to make the rivalry effective. The execution of the policy should be permissive because Congress, when it adjourns in a few weeks, cannot hope to foresee all that may happen in the world until next January. No one can say, for example, just what will happen if continental Europe revalues, or embargoes gold, or has great political disturbances. Nor can anyone be perfectly sure how the silver-using Orient will react. It would, therefore, be the height of folly to bind the President so that he cannot deal with circumstances as they arise.

It is hard to see why there should not be an agreement on a measure of this sort. It accepts the thesis of all disinterested advocates of silver which is that silver should be restored to the status of reserve or basic money. It avoids the danger of bimetallism, which is demonstrably unworkable except possibly by an international agreement that no one has a right to hope for now. It avoids the danger, which many apprehend, of the dumping of silver in enormous quantities. It involves no commitments to spend unlimited sums. It keeps the situation under control.

With silver set up in this fashion, the Government would be able to test out the possibilities of positive action to reduce the value of gold. It may be that gold hoarding will not stop even if men see gold falling in terms of silver. They may not flee from gold as the silver people expect them to. I do not see how anyone can be perfectly certain what men suffering from an economic psychosis will do.

The most one can say is that in theory based on past experience the thing ought to have some effect, and it is better to have an intelligent silver policy than no policy.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8687, the so-called "tariff bill."

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in recent years many of the commercial countries have seemed intent upon destroying international trade. Each government has seemingly tried to get ahead of the others in the ruinous game, with tariff increases, cartels, quotas, or any other device that might appease the selfish appetite of one or destroy the trade of another. Yet each government has inevitably sustained injury to its own trade because of the prompt retaliatory measures invoked by its competitors. Today scarcely a third of the 1929 value of world trade remains. The heaping-up of trade barriers helped to bring on the depression, which, in turn, brought more barriers and with them the near destruction of trade between countries. The United States, which has been one of the most serious offenders in this commercial warfare, has been the most acute sufferer. Trade has declined everywhere, but in no other country has this decline been so steep or so far-reaching as in this country.

One should never put himself in the "I told you so" class, but this Chamber still echoes with the warnings made by some of us when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was under discussion here. Not only did we point out with prophetic vision the disastrous effect of increasing tariff duties, but we buttressed our appeals and prophecies with the views of the leading economists of the country. That is history now, but what of the present situation?

The proportion of the total international trade of the world enjoyed by the United States has declined more since 1929 than that of any of the 11 leading commercial countries. In respect to exports, the proportion enjoyed by 8 of the 11 leading countries has, indeed, increased. Thus, Germany in 1929 enjoyed 9.72 percent of the total world exports. In 1932 the figure had increased to 10.7 percent. In France the corresponding figures were 5.95 percent and 6.08 percent. The United States in the meantime had dropped from 15.61 percent in 1929 to 12.39 percent in 1932. If imports and exports are combined, Great Britain, whose export trade suffered a decline, increased relatively from 13.04 percent to 13.38 percent, while the United States declined from 13.83 percent to 10.92 percent. These figures tell a startling story. Had the United States maintained the proportion of world trade which it enjoyed in 1929, its imports and exports in 1932 would have been greater than the actual figures by more than $750,000,000. That is something to give us concern.

In 1929 the international trade of the United States amounted to $9,640,000,000; in 1933 it had shrunk to $3,124,000,000.

Illustrations of this sort might be multiplied. But no matter what they are based on, or from what source they are taken, the result is essentially the same: The United States has led the world in the universal loss of international trade—a loss more complete than what history records to have been the case in any other economic depression.

These cold facts form a compelling reason for passing the bill which is now before the Senate. If ever reason dictated a clear course, this is the time.

Just as the countries have vied with one another in destroying international trade, they must now cooperate in its restoration.

What we propose is simply to enable—perhaps I should say to instruct—the Chief Executive to execute the will of Congress promptly and thoroughly, so that obstructions to trade in this country shall be reduced proportionately to the reduction in trade barriers imposed on us by other countries. If we are to accomplish that, the machinery at the command of our Government can be no less efficient for meeting emergencies of international trade than the machinery of any other government.

The executive branches of other governments, as we all know, possess authority and power to negotiate trade agreements and to bring them into force at once. We propose by the bill to state the policy of Congress and to give the Executive the power to carry out that stated policy by the most effective means practicable. To cope with the rapidly shifting currents of international trade and to take advantage of existing opportunities, this is an essential part of the program.

Other countries are acting. During the last few months the commercial countries of the world have entered into many scores of commercial agreements. These vary in content, but a large proportion of them is of the type contemplated under this bill.

The Assistant Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Dickinson, testified before the Committee on Finance that the records of that Department showed something like 150 such agreements were negotiated in 1933 alone. About 45 countries participated in one or more of these agreements; and according to the Department of Commerce, about 40 countries now have up for negotiation or consideration trade agreements of this sort.

Of course, no nation not a party to these negotiations knows how much time is required to conclude a particular treaty. Investigations must, of course, be made. Facts and data must be accumulated. But once a nation is ready to act, there is no delay. When the facts are all in, action can be taken almost overnight. That is what has been done; that is the experience of all countries. In other words, no advantage is lost because of needless delay between the time such a contract is agreed on by the parties and the time it is put into effect.

In reducing barriers to their international trade by reciprocal agreements, other governments have succeeded in increasing trade. It is our hope that when the machinery set up by this bill is in full operation, we will see a change in the figures of the foreign trade of the United States—a change from a relative decline to a holding of our own with the rest of the world—if not to an actual increase.

The enactment of the bill into law should mean increased trade; and only by increased trade can the full capacity of our industries which produce a surplus for export be profitably employed. It means freight for our railroads and ships. It means traffic for our ports. It means increased business in all activities which serve trade. All these propositions together mean increased employment, increased business, and a return of industrial and agricultural stability.

II

ANALYSIS OF BILL

The proposed legislation deals with a problem which vitally concerns the welfare of the whole country—a problem which transcends party lines and party politics. It overshadows any one locality or section of the country. Unless some practical measure is taken to stem the growing decline in American foreign trade, not only will our export industries and producers be menaced but our whole economic structure will be disastrously affected.

The stated purpose of this proposal is the expansion of foreign markets for the products of the United States. Under its terms the Congress lays down a broad policy of seeking to assist in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, and in increasing the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency through the expansion of foreign markets for American products. The bill so states. In order that this purpose may be carried out, the Executive is authorized, whenever he finds that existing duties or import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States, (1) to enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments, and (2) to proclaim such modifications of existing duties or such continuance of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign-trade agreement that the President has entered into in pursuance of the authority of the bill.

Definite limitations are nevertheless laid down restricting the President's action. These limitations, following the pattern established by section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922 and continued in section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930, provide that no proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and the free list. As I shall shortly suggest, the powers thus conferred upon the President follow previous precedents. The bill contains no single element that is essentially new; its only novelty is to combine in a single bill powers which heretofore were conferred singly by separate laws.

In order that no change shall be made in American duties without obtaining compensating advantages for American producers in foreign markets, the President is authorized by the bill to modify American duties and import restrictions only in connection with foreign-trade agreements in return for corresponding undertakings by foreign governments for the expansion or the protection of American exports.

In addition to permitting the modification of duties or restrictions, the bill permits the President to enter into commitments whereby the existing customs or excise treatment of specified articles will be maintained; that is, the excise taxes upon oil, coal, copper, lumber, and so forth. Unless it were possible to provide in such trade agreements against the increase of excise taxes, the advantages derived through a lowering of customs duties guaranteed in such trade agreements might be entirely lost through the imposition of excise duties such as consumption taxes and the like; so these agreements will provide for inhibitions upon such a policy.

The stabilization of customs duties and restrictions which the proposed legislation will make possible is an important consideration. The proposed agreements will remove the risk which, owing to the possibility of capricious action by foreign governments, now attends every international transaction.

Under the provisions of the bill the proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall not be confined alone to articles coming from those foreign countries which are parties to such trade agreements. The United States has already entered into treaties and agreements with the great majority of nations under which the parties agree to grant to each other the treatment accorded to the most favored nation. It would, therefore, be impossible, without violation of these treaties, to restrict the privileges of a trade agreement to the single nation with which the agreement is made. It would also be unwise; for the effort to give special favors to individual nations is the pathway to keen competition, discrimination, and eventual trade warfare. If concessions made under the agreements are withheld from countries with which agreements have not been concluded, we cannot expect such countries to extend to us concessions which they have made under similar agreements with other countries. Since foreign countries have concluded many more such agreements than we have, American commerce would lose heavily from the withdrawal of most-favored-nation treatment from us. Advantages obtained by reciprocity with some countries might thus be nullified by discrimination in others. The sound pathway to follow in international trade lies through a generalization of rates and an equality of treatment to all. For this reason the privileges granted to each nation are to be applied under the terms of the bill to all countries alike. To this general policy, however, the proposed legislation makes certain exceptions. The President may withdraw the enjoyment of such rates from any country because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce or because of other acts or policies which in his opinion tend to defeat the purposes of the measure. A further exception relates to the Republic of Cuba. Because of the peculiar relationship existing between the United States and Cuba, the bill, following the established policy of the United States in such matters, excepts Cuba from the operation of its provisions for the generalization of rates, thus making it possible to grant special reductions to Cuba which need not apply to other countries.

The right to accord preferential treatment to Cuban commerce is specifically reserved in most of the favored-nation treaties and agreements to which this Government is a party. Of course, we could not do anything else than that, because we now have this preferential agreement with Cuba, and it ought to be maintained.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator; but I should prefer to conclude my remarks first, and then answer any questions.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I shall not interrupt the Senator until he finishes.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the terms of the bill certain inconsistent provisions of the Tariff Act of 1930 are repealed or rendered inapplicable with respect to the foreign trade agreements. That matter has given some concern to one or two Senators, who have called it to my attention. One of these involves section 336, the so-called "flexible tariff provision", under which the President is authorized to raise or lower duties in accordance with the findings of the Tariff Commission based upon the difference in cost of production between the United States and the principal competing foreign country. Obviously it would be impossible to exercise this function with respect to a rate of duty which the President in a foreign-trade agreement had promised should be maintained at a stated level. The provisions of section 336, therefore, are made inapplicable to any article with respect to the importation of which a foreign-trade agreement has been concluded pursuant to the present proposal. Except, however, for its inapplicability in such a case—namely, in the trade agreements which might be entered into—section 336 remains in full force and effect. Except as above stated, the present bill does not take away from the Tariff Commission any power which it now possesses, nor does it prevent its exercising its functions under section 336 with respect to all rates that are not made the subject of agreements with other countries.

The proposed legislation would repeal certain contingent-duty provisions contained in the Tariff Act of 1930. In that act a number of paragraphs contain provisions whereby the duties on specified commodities are levied in excess of the general rate and made to vary according to the height of the duties imposed by foreign countries on such products of the United States. The effect of such provisions is to violate existing treaties granting most-favored-nation treatment; and, since most of these provisions are mandatory, they compel discrimination against foreign countries which may be guilty of no discrimination whatsoever against American goods. If those who are particularly interested in that matter will read the report of the Finance Committee or the report of the Ways and Means Committee they will find that the reports point out specifically and particularly the paragraphs alluded to here which are repealed by this measure.

Moreover, it will probably be found desirable to include in the proposed Executive agreements a general most-favored-nation clause, so that there will not only be reductions in foreign duties but a safeguard against greater reductions being later given to our competitors. If these contingent-duty provisions remain in force, the Executive would be unable to include a general most-favored-nation clause in the proposed agreements. The bill accordingly provides for the elimination of these indefensible contingent-duty provisions.

As an illustration of that, I may say that we have at present a 10-percent duty, I believe, on automobiles. Other countries may have a duty of 10 percent against us. England might, perchance, put a 30-percent duty on automobiles. If so, under the law, we have the right to impose a 30-percent duty on automobiles imported from England. Of course, if we enter into these agreements and desire to treat all countries alike and have a most-favored-nation clause in our agreements with them, we ought not to have such a provision as that. Rather, there ought to be general equality of treatment, because if England imposes a 30-percent duty, she does not put it specifically against us; she puts it against all the nations of the world. Contingent duties such as these are not to be confused with countervailing duties. Countervailing duties under section 303 of the Tariff Act of 1930 may be imposed on any dutiable article imported into the United States with respect to which a bounty or grant has been paid in a foreign country. Such additional duty is a countervailing duty. No one proposes to repeal the provision of law for the imposition of countervailing duties of the kind to which reference has just been made. Consequently, we do not repeal that law in this measure. Similarly, the present bill does not repeal provisions for antidumping duties under the act of 1921, nor does it repeal section 337 of the existing tariff law, the purpose of which is to prevent unfair practices, nor section 338 of the Tariff Act of 1930 to prevent discrimination, nor section 3 (e) of the Industrial Recovery Act to prevent importations under such conditions as to render ineffective or seriously to endanger the maintenance of any code made under the National Industrial Recovery Act. We do not touch those matters at all in this proposal.

The third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 contains special provisions with reference to wheat. The purpose was to prevent any benefit accruing under the exclusive reciprocity treaty between the United States and Cuba to flour manufactured from imported wheat. Under the bill it is provided that this section, which was enacted with the preferential treaty with Cuba in mind, shall be inapplicable to any agreement concluded under the bill with any country which does not, like Cuba, grant by such agreement exclusive preferential duties to the United States with respect to flour.

Many will recall that when that provision was adopted there was quite a fight here between the millers of Buffalo, I believe, and the southwestern millers, which lasted many days. Much controversy arose. Now, however, the southwestern millers and the Buffalo millers have agreed upon this proposal, and I am sure that no controversy will arise at all. In this proposal we maintain the status quo, so far as imported wheat and wheat exported to Cuba is concerned.

The bill is written to meet an emergency arising out of disastrous economic conditions. The bill, therefore, provides that the authority of the President to enter into foreign-trade agreements under its provisions shall terminate at the expiration of 3 years from the date of its enactment. That is to say, after 3 years have passed, the President will no longer be empowered to enter into foreign-trade agreements under the act. Nevertheless, such foreign-trade agreements as have been already entered into under the proposed legislation may, if they prove advantageous to the United States, be continued in force until terminated in accordance with the terms of the agreements themselves. These terms must provide for opportunity to terminate the agreements on not exceeding 6 months' notice at any time under 3 years from the date on which the agreements come into force.

In other words, after 3 years from the enactment of the law the President will have no more authority to enter into these trade agreements, and if trade agreements are made, say two and a half years from now, they might run along for 3 years, but they can be terminated at any time after that time upon 6 months' notice.

I am sure that the Senate will appreciate that that is a very wise provision, because if the agreements are advantageous to the United States in opening up new markets to us, and in assisting in the sale of our exportable surpluses, they ought to be preserved and ought to be maintained, and ought to be continued for longer than 3 years.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I hesitated to interrupt the Senator, because I recall the request he made of the Senator from Nebraska.

I simply desired to ask whether the committee had made a study and was advised that there were any markets in the world where we could sell our surplus products if this bill should become a law?

Mr. HARRISON. The committee have given a great deal of study to this subject. I think it is axiomatic that that result would follow.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator discuss that phase of the subject before he concludes? Is that a part of his prepared speech?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not go into that matter except in a general way, but I am sure that as the discussion proceeds, each Senator will express his own viewpoint about it. The figures I cited a moment ago, however, as to the international trade of the world, showed that 11 large countries which had entered into trade agreements had increased their exports, while the United States, the big sister of the world, has been just closed out, and her exports have constantly declined.

Mr. McNARY. It is not my purpose to suggest to the Senator how to present the subject, but I think the most important question, which the Senator says he is discussing in generalities, ought to be discussed particularly with respect to whether we are to accomplish under this measure the sale of those products of which we now have a surplus in this country.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure that at least the Democratic members of the Committee on Finance were convinced that it would be very advantageous to the producers of the United States, not only of agricultural products but of other commodities to enter into trade agreements. The administration has been convinced of that fact, and if it were not so this proposal would not be here to consume the time of the Senate.

III

SAFEGUARDS AGAINST ILL-CONSIDERED ACTION

It is natural that when the Congress proposes to place additional authority in the hands of the Chief Executive assurance should be given that this added authority will be used in the public welfare and will not be misused to the possible detriment of any portion of our people. In the case of the pending legislation there is no real reason for fearing misuse on the one hand or failure of aggressive and efficient use on the other.

Bear in mind the fact that the objective of every move which the administration is making is to increase employment and to insure profitable production. What Senator here could contradict the statement that the heart and soul of this administration are in the effort to carry out such a policy, based upon such a principle? It follows as a matter of course that no step will be taken without weighing carefully the question whether this objective will be accomplished. No agreement looking toward an increase in exports will be made if it would produce an increase of importation of such commodities as would retard employment and production in this country.

Nevertheless, to allay the fear that the needs and desires of private business interests might be ignored or that ill-considered action might be taken, the Committee on Finance has adopted an amendment which meets the approval of the administration, making it compulsory on the Chief Executive to give public notice of intended negotiations so that interested persons may have an opportunity to present their views, and requiring that the President utilize the information and advice which the Tariff Commission and other branches of the Government are in a position to furnish.

IV

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LEGISLATION

Now I wish to cite some precedents. It has been contended that this legislation would be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the President; it has been said that it would be an unconstitutional delegation of treaty-making power to the President, and thereby would conflict with the provisions of the Constitution relating to these two matters. Your committee has looked into the constitutional problems raised by the proposed legislation with much care, and has been impressed with the fact that the bill goes no further in invoking the assistance of the Chief Executive than do numerous former enactments whose constitutionality has been sustained by the Supreme Court. In fact, this bill simply carries forward the same policy which the Congress, under both Republican and Democratic administrations, has been following over a long period of years.

As early as 1794, when many of the framers of the Constitution were still active on the scene, Congress enacted a law empowering the President of the United States whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require, not merely to impose restrictions upon the carrying on of foreign commerce but to cut off foreign commerce altogether by laying an embargo on all ships and vessels, both domestic and foreign, in the ports of the United States under such regulations as the circumstances of the case may require, and to continue or revoke the embargo whenever he shall think proper. Wide and discretionary powers were given the President in that act. Following this, various acts were passed by Congress giving the President the power to issue proclamations regulating commerce in one way or another. Such were the acts of 1799, of 1806, of 1807, of 1809, and of 1810.

In order to put an end to the disastrous warfare over tonnage duties, Congress passed an act, approved March 3, 1815, which provided for the repeal of the existing discriminating tonnage duties between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States "whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished." Similar statutes were passed in 1824 and in 1828, and these were substantially preserved in section 4228 of the Revised Statutes. Under these acts proclamations were issued by Presidents Adams, Jackson, Polk, Fillmore, Buchanan, Lincoln, Johnson, Grant, and Hayes. Under such acts Executive agreements were entered into providing for reciprocal abolition of discriminating duties, and these agreements were brought into force by proclamations issued by the President. These agreements were not submitted to the Senate.

A program of tariff bargaining by Executive agreements was initiated by a Republican administration through the McKinley Act of 1890. Section 3 of this act provided that certain specified commodities should be admitted free of duty, but that the President should be authorized to impose specified rates of duty against nations charging unequal and unreasonable duties against the United States. The McKinley Act provided that, "whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the Government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act."

Following the passage of the act, Secretary Blaine began the negotiation of a series of agreements. During the years 1891 and 1892, 10 such reciprocal agreements were concluded, none of them being submitted to the Congress for approval or ratification. That is what a Republican administration did, under Republican leadership.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will permit me to conclude. Then I will submit to any interrogation.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will permit, I just want to say it is principally Republican authority we have for this Democratic thing we are fixing to do, as I understand.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator overlooks the fact that I quoted from acts inspired by such Democratic leaders as Jefferson, Madison, and others of that day.

As I said, during the years 1891 and 1892, 10 such reciprocal agreements were concluded, none of them being submitted to the Congress for approval or ratification. At once the cry went up that the act of 1890 was an unconstitutional delegation of legislative and of treaty-making power. The issue was fought out in the courts, and the act of 1890 was sustained by the United States Supreme Court in 1892 in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U.S. 649). Mr. Justice Harlan, rendering the opinion of the Court, declared that—

> The words "he may deem", in the third section, of course, implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable, or the contrary, in their effect upon American products.

Mr. Justice Harlan concluded that—

> The Court is of opinion that the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not liable to the objection that it transfers legislative and treaty-making power to the President.

This policy of tariff bargaining by Executive agreement was still further extended by another Republican administration in the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897. The Dingley Tariff Act contained two interesting sections—the one, section 3, authorizing the President to enter into negotiations for commercial arrangements by Executive agreement without submission of the agreement to the Senate; and the other, section 4, providing for the negotiation of commercial treaties, requiring their submission to the Senate for ratification.

Section 3 of this act provided that "for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries, and their colonies, producing and exporting to this country" certain articles therein named, the President was authorized to enter into negotiations with the governments of such countries with a view to the conclusion of commercial argeements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions might be secured in favor of the manufactures and products of the United States, and "with a view to secure reciprocal trade * * * whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country" producing and exporting to the United States certain specified commodities "imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States, which * * * he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power" to suspend by proclamation the provisions of the act for such time as he shall deem just.

Pursuant to the authority thus conferred by section 3, the President concluded agreements with France in 1898, 1902, and 1908; with Portugal in 1899 and 1902; with Germany in 1900, 1906, and 1907; with Italy in 1900 and 1909; with Switzerland in 1906; with Spain in 1906 and 1909; with Bulgaria in 1906; with the Netherlands in 1907; and with Great Britain in 1907. These agreements were not submitted to the Senate, but were brought into force by proclamation by the President and were given full force and effect by various decisions of the courts of the United States.

Section 3 proved practicable and valuable in regulating and benefiting the foreign trade of the United States. But compare the results under section 3—and this is to answer those who would bring the agreements back to the Senate for ratification—with the results under section 4 of the law, which provided for entering into these treaties, and for their submission to the Senate of the United States. Section 4 authorized the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to negotiate treaties with foreign countries providing for reciprocal tariff concessions. Pursuant to this authorization the President concluded a series of treaties, known as the "Kasson Treaties", all of which made provision for reciprocal concessions of considerable importance. But every one of these treaties failed to receive ratification by the Senate, and therefore never came into force. Section 4 of the Dingley Tariff Act proved a dead letter and demonstrated the futility of seeking to improve the foreign trade of the United States by commercial agreements which are required to be submitted to the Senate for ratification.

A further step in the direction of this same general policy was taken by another Republican administration in the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 by the enactment of the flexible provision, concerning which when it was before the Senate some Senators grew eloquent in their criticism.

Section 315 of this act, the so-called "flexible tariff provision", provided for the lowering or raising of duties by proclamation of the President on the basis of differences in the cost of production of articles in the United States and the like or similar articles in foreign countries. Although section 315 delegated to the President the power to raise or lower tariffs up to a 50-percent limit, this power was to be based upon a finding of fact with regard to the differences in the cost of production. After a number of years' experience, however, the matter of determining such differences in cost of production has proved to be an impracticable, if not an impossible, proposition.

We heard before our committee the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, Mr. O'Brien, who happens to be a Republican, but who even advocated the elimination altogether of the difference-in-cost-of-production feature. As has been pointed out by the Chairman of the Tariff Commission in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee and before the Committee on Finance, the test of difference in cost of production constitutes anything but a definite and precise fact basis upon which to reach determinations. Because of great variations in cost of production over different sections of the country, because of varying costs due to varying crop conditions in the case of agricultural products, because of the impossibility of determining costs in the case of byproducts in the making of other commodities, because of fluctuating currency values as between different countries, and because of many other facts, it has proved extremely problematical in some cases and wholly impossible in others to determine exact costs of production. In no less than eight of the recent studies made by the Tariff Commission, the Commission was compelled to report itself unable to determine the cost of production.

Therefore, although the flexible provision enacted in 1922 empowers the President to raise or lower tariffs on a supposed finding of fact, in practical experience it leaves to the President large discretionary powers, particularly in view of the fact that the President is not compelled to put into force the recommendation of the Tariff Commission. The constitutionality of section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922, no matter what we then thought about it or may have thought about it since, was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Hampton case and in other cases.

In the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922, section 316 gave to the President power whenever unfair competition and unfair acts in the importation of articles into the United States should tend to destroy or injure an industry, to cause additional import duties to be imposed, or in extreme cases to cause such articles to be excluded altogether from the United States—a most broad power given to the President by that section.

Section 317 of the same act went even further. This section provided that when the public interest would be served thereby, the President should, by proclamation, specify and declare new or additional duties on the products of any foreign country whenever he should find that such country was discriminating against the commerce of the United States as compared with that of other countries. Under this section no finding by the Tariff Commission was required, and the President was given the widest sort of discretion.

The same policy was pursued again by a Republican administration in the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930. Section 336 of that act substantially reenacted section 315 of the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922, and section 337 substantially reenacted the former section 316, and section 338 substantially reenacted the former section 317. The constitutionality of section 336 of the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930 was again questioned and upheld in 1932 in the case of the United States against Sears, Roebuck.

It must be evident that the tariff-bargaining bill goes no further in the delegation of power than preceding measures have gone. It merely carries forward the policy long ago inaugurated and subsequently continued by various Republican administrations. It combines the feature of the tariff bargaining by Executive agreement embodied in the McKinley Act of 1890 and the Dingley Act of 1897, and the feature of tariff adjustment by Presidential proclamation within a 50-percent limit inaugurated in the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 and continued in the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930.

The discretion given to the President by the proposed bill, which empowers him to enter into foreign-trade agreements "whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States" and that the "purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States * * * will be promoted" thereby is no greater than the discretion conferred upon the President by the act of 1794, which empowered him to take drastic action "whenever in his opinion the public safety shall so require." It follows the same policy laid down in the act of 1890 which authorized the President to act whenever he "shall be satisfied" that a foreign government imposes rates which "he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable."

Again, it is similar to the policy of the act of 1897, which authorized the President to enter into agreements with foreign countries whenever concessions are made by foreign countries which, in the judgment of the President, are "reciprocal and equivalent." It is a discretion no wider than that conferred by section 317 of the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 and section 338 of the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930, which authorized the President to declare new or additional duties on the products of any foreign country whenever he finds that such country "discriminates in fact against the commerce of the United States directly or indirectly." The proposed act does no more than to carry forward the policy established and continued by various Republican administrations, as well as Democratic administrations, through previous congressional enactments which have been uniformly upheld by the courts.

CONCLUSION

There should be no politics in this question. The former Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, made an eloquent radio address on this subject. Of course, I see smiles upon the faces of certain Senators on the other side of the Chamber, but Mr. Stimson stood high in the councils of the Republican Party. He was the Secretary of State in the last administration. He had never gotten away from Republican principles and Republican adherence.

The Senators on the other side of the Chamber can snicker and they can smile if they please, but they are obliged to accept in part at least from one great Republican leader of this country the views which he expressed in his broadcast speech of a few days ago, in which he urged the renewal and increase of that American spirit which seeks to expand economic life and to make the whole world its market. No less eloquently did he denounce the attitude of those who would restrict the production of this great country to its own immediate consumptive needs.

Overproduction has frequently been charged as a contributing factor in the depression. To my way of thinking, however, it is more a case of underconsumption than of overproduction. But whatever the term, our great surpluses, both industrial and agricultural, have dragged our markets down and down. The results have been particularly obvious, and particularly tragic, in the case of those agricultural products which are on an export basis. Surpluses of cotton, wheat, and corn, for example, have necessitated the adoption of certain highly artificial crop-reduction programs. None of us like the idea of economic waste, but, as a temporary expedient, applied to agriculture, it is certainly preferable to economic destruction. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration, despite the criticisms heaped upon it, has been the salvation of American agriculture.

I greatly admired both the vision and the courage of Secretary Wallace, when he stated to the Committee on Finance:

> You have under consideration * * * the problem of restoring foreign purchasing power by accepting more goods from abroad, which policy, if completely successful, would enable us to do away with these acreage-control measures, a situation which would make us, in the Agricultural Department, exceedingly happy.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am very much interested in this portion of the discussion, more so than that which has preceded. Does the Senator believe, if this great power shall be conferred upon the President, that he will be able to find new markets for some of our basic commodities; for instance, wheat?

Mr. HARRISON. We hope so.

Mr. McNARY. Of course we hope so; I have been hoping so for a great many years.

Mr. HARRISON. No one can tell, of course, what will happen.

Mr. McNARY. As I said a few moments ago, the weakness of the Senator's position is the fact that he is discussing the question very generally without specifying, from the testimony given to the committee or according to his own views based upon any substantial reasons, where the markets are to be obtained, how they will be obtained, and who will discover them, if this power shall be conferred upon the President.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that it is quite historic that some years ago Mr. McCumber, who was a very distinguished Member of this body and Chairman of the Finance Committee; and also, I am sure, the distinguished then Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Lodge, who at that time was the leader of his party in the Senate, as he had been for a long number of years, and who was likewise a member of the Finance Committee; Mr. Nelson, who was a very distinguished Senator from the great Northwest; and, I think, Mr. Smoot, who afterward became Chairman of the Finance Committee, all agreed, so far as wheat is concerned, that its price was fixed in the markets of the world. They were trying to get a market in the world for wheat, and they thought, if they could find such a market, the price of wheat would go up. Of course, in this day I do not know whether any Republicans agree with those distinguished gentlemen or not. I agreed with their idea then, and I think it is correct today. I have no doubt that the passage of this measure will give us an opportunity to sell some of our exportable agricultural products abroad, as well as to sell some of our industrial products abroad.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not want to quarrel with the Senator——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator could not quarrel with me.

Mr. McNARY. I would not do so if I could, of course, but the whole justification, if there is any, for the conference of this peculiar power on the President is upon the theory that he may be able to find, through himself or some agency, markets for our surplus products. The Senator mentioned wheat, and I again refer to wheat. The Secretary of Agriculture, who has attained fame since he became a Cabinet member, served as a delegate at London and at Geneva on the occasion of the great wheat conference in the effort to bring about a curtailment of the production of wheat. We have today a policy adopted and applied by the Congress giving power to the Secretary of Agriculture to curtail production by the retirement of excess acreage in order to put wheat upon a domestic basis. If, on the one hand, we are to put it upon a domestic basis, what use is there of the President's attempting to find foreign markets, when it is the policy of his department to proceed in another way; namely, to bring about a balance between production and consumption?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say to the Senator——

Mr. McNARY. If I may say just one word more, I have asked the Senator several times what study was made by the committee of the subject, and what has he in his manuscript that has any bearing on that very substantial factor in the discussion of this question?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is one of the shrewdest——

Mr. McNARY. I will admit that without any reference on the part of the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I will not say one of the shrewdest politicians, but I will say statesman. He is as adroit a strategist as I know, because anybody who can hold in line the Senators on the other side of the Chamber has got to be classed as a very successful political strategist. The Senator knows, however, whenever we start to discuss one particular commodity in connection with a proposal to enter into reciprocal trade agreements that the house falls. It so happens that one gentleman in this administration mentioned, I think, lace in one of his speeches, and the lace manufacturers came here in a great horde saying that we were going to try to destroy that industry. It so happened that at one time some gentleman mentioned wool, and immediately some politically minded persons, and the wool manufacturers in the East, in order to secure an effect from that statement, began to send word out to the wool growers and producers in the West, to influence them against this proposal by saying that this whole measure was proposed with the idea of trying to reduce the price of wool.

So, I will say to the Senator, whether it was good strategy or not, we tried in the hearings not to go into the details and not to inquire into particular commodities, because I have in my experience here found out if there is the slightest grain of something produced in somebody's State, and it is sought to reduce the tariff thereon, that there arises immediately opposition on the part of the individuals interested. So I want to avoid going into details as to such matters. I believe if we can enter into reciprocal trade agreements that wheat might be helped; I believe that cotton might be helped; I believe that corn might be helped; I believe that other agricultural products might be helped; and that many industrial products might also be helped. Certainly no one can tell me, with the world full of markets and people ready to buy and other nations selling, that there is no market for this country, if we pursue a wise, statesmanlike course and try to trade with them and to sell some of our surplus products to them.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator be kind enough to yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator has just referred to wool. A few days ago I had the privilege of discussing the subject with the accredited agents of the wool producers of this country. They advised me by reason of the threat of the passage of this bill the market was demoralized, that the price level had descended about 30 to 40 percent; and if the fear which this bill engenders in the mind of growers is to continue for 3 years, I doubt if we will have even a domestic market for wool.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has put his finger right on the point I was trying to emphasize, namely, that it does not pay to discuss some particular commodity. The woolen manufacturers of the East, of course, used to be against the wool producers of the West; but the Senator remembers the debacle that caused a wedlock between the two; and now it is to their interest, of course, to work pretty much together. If the manufacturers of wool of the East desired to create propaganda against this bill and to destroy it as being a step forward against economic isolation and for the building up of international trade, they naturally would use every device and every scheme and every kind of propaganda, even to the extent of outwitting the Senator from Oregon, though I think they could hardly do that, to create the impression that this measure is against the interests of the wool producers of the West. So that is why they came here. I have not the slightest idea—I never heard anyone say who may have charge of the administration of this measure—that wool is in contemplation in the slightest degree; and yet it is part of the plan, if possible, to destroy this bill, to fool the wool growers of the West. I hope they have not fooled my friend from Oregon, and I know they have not.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator, and I do not think they have, either.

Mr. HARRISON. No.

Mr. McNARY. But the people about whom I spoke were wool producers throughout the country.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Their statement is supported by the condition of the wool market, which has declined by the reason of this simple fear entertained because of the prospective passage of this act and the great power it confers upon the President; and it will continue to be demoralized, I fear, so long as legislation of this character may remain upon the statute books.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, they point out the decline in the wool market; I do not know as to that; I have not kept up with that; but it is just as reasonable to suppose that the manufacturers in the East, who have led astray the wool producers of the West, and, in turn, certain Senators into the belief that it might affect them, have driven the price down lower. If these people had kept on their feet instead of having howled without cause, without rhyme or reason, no idea would ever have been created in the market places or anywhere else that anything was going to be done about wool; and perhaps the price would not have been affected. I say to you, Mr. President, that I have talked to those who will be in charge of the administration of this measure, who say that wool has not been in the mind of anybody. I have not the slightest idea that it will be touched; but the suggestion is a part of the propaganda of people who will cut their own noses off and hurt their own interest by creating an impression that something is going to be done which is not going to be done.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. May I infer from the Senator's remarks that he speaks the voice of the Executive, and that Executive does not intend to touch the wool problem at all?

Mr. HARRISON. No, I do not speak the voice of the Executive; but I will say that in this controversy I have been in pretty close touch with "the powers that be."

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator, if he is now assuring the wool growers of the West, as I am satisfied he is, that wool will not be touched by any Executive trade agreement, what other basic commodities will remain untouched during the 3-year period?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, that is the strategy of the Senator. He not only wants an assurance as to wool, but after a while he will bring up olives, and after a while he will bring up some other commodity. That is the whole scheme of the opposition. That is why I say that we are not going to discuss details in connection with a measure of this kind.

Here is a letter or a memorandum which was written by the Secretary of State which it might now be well to read.

Members of Congress from the wool-growing States have called the Department's attention to reports being circulated in those regions to the effect that if the tariff-bargaining bill is passed there is an intention of immediately reducing the duty on wool. The object of these reports, according to the word sent me by the Members of Congress who know conditions in the wool-growing States, is to depress current prices for wool.

All reports regarding any contemplated action affecting wool are wholly unjustified and irresponsible. As set forth in a recent letter to Senator O'MAHONEY—

"In the first place no discussion whatsoever has been had here about wool nor has there been any negotiation concerning any other specific commodity apart from the very narrow range of items which entered into our discussions with Cuba. Secondly, the broad and definite policy on which all reciprocity trade agreements will rest is that of mutual and equal profitableness to the countries participating. Thirdly, it must be apparent that after the passage of the tariff-bargaining bill an effective organization freely accessible to all interests concerned must be developed. Ample time will be required for the making of necessary studies and for carrying on exploratory conversations with various governments before steps can be taken for the negotiation of definitive agreements."

Furthermore, a recent amendment to the tariff-bargaining bill incorporating the administration's plans provides for opportunity to any interested person to present his views to the President or to such agency as the President may designate before any action is taken.

In conclusion I may state that no action of any kind affecting wool has ever been entered into in any discussions in regard to the tariff-bargaining policy.

Now let me proceed.

Mr. McNARY. I shall; but will the Senator be kind enough to advise me who is the author of the letter?

Mr. HARRISON. This is Secretary of State Hull's statement on the question.

Mr. McNARY. So in concluding our colloquy, am I to have the understanding that the administration spokesman has stated that wool will be left out of consideration during the time this measure shall be on the statute books?

Mr. HARRISON. I can only give the Senator my own individual views with reference to that matter. I have stated that there will be no politics in the question, and I am sure the Senator from Oregon, as the leader of his party, will not permit politics to enter into it. [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Oregon spoke about agriculture. The figures of the Department of Agriculture are to the effect that foreign purchasing power has in the past absorbed the products of some 50,000,000 acres of crop land. The market for that vast farm territory has been practically destroyed. Is it not worth regaining?

What is true as to agriculture is no less true as to industry. We cannot shut out imports without at the same time shutting in potential exports. And when we do that we are reducing the standard of living of our people, throwing out of use untold acreage of productive soil, requiring the transfer of whole populations from their homes and from the scenes of their present activities to new and presumably less profitable employment in other sections. When you recall that the vast and important industries in this country, both agricultural and manufacturing, would have to curtail their operation and close down in some cases as much as three fifths of their production if international trade should be cut off, you will appreciate the beneficial effect which must come from the stimulation of international trade that this proposal seeks to produce. The cotton farmer; the worker in the automobile, machinery, and electrical-appliance industries; the farmer who raises hogs or wheat or rice or tobacco or numerous other necessities do not have to be reminded of these facts. They must have a market abroad. It concerns vitally the well-being and the economic recovery of our entire country. Unless some constructive program is formulated and affirmative action taken, America will not regain the proportion of world trade which she has been steadily losing since 1929. We shall not regain business prosperity by a policy of drifting or doing nothing. We must act; and in order to meet existing world conditions and the competition of foreign nations equipped with efficient bargaining machinery and now winning the trade of the world away from the United States, the program embodied in the proposed legislation seems the most advantageous, if not the only practicable, program.

I can do no better than close with the words of a Republican President, spoken in his last public utterance—words which at this time seem strangely prophetic. At the Pan American Exposition in Buffalo in 1901, President McKinley, speaking of world trade and the policy which America should follow, said:

> The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not. If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue, or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our market abroad?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to have the Senator's interpretation of the prohibition against the application of the new power to articles upon the free list. There is, on page 3, line 3, a specific prohibition against the transfer of any article from the free list to the dutiable list. Would the Senator construe that prohibition as prohibiting any use whatever of the new power in connection with the free list?

Mr. HARRISON. I construe it that we did not think we had the power, perhaps, to delegate from Congress the right to take from the free list and put on the dutiable list, and so, rather than get involved on that point, we said the power was only to increase by not to exceed 50 percent or to reduce by not to exceed 50 percent. The President has no power to take from the free list and put on the dutiable list, or to take from the dutiable list and put on the free list.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that is so; but perhaps I have not made myself clear. Could the President deal with the free list by the application of quotas, even though he did not take an article off the free list?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, he has the power granted in another part of the bill to deal with quotas and "to proclaim such modifications of existing duties or other import restrictions." He can apply quotas and other "additional restrictions."

Mr. VANDENBERG. He can use that power in respect to the free list as well as the dutiable list?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; I think he could apply it without doubt. He would be dealing with a particular article and if he wanted to apply the quota he would have the right to do it. That would have to come under the particular agreement then under consideration.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand. It is the Senator's judgment, then, that the power would extend to the free list insofar as quotas or kindred methods of dealing with commodities are concerned?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to ask the Senator for another interpretation. In the clause on page 6 which provides for hearings before any foreign-trade agreement shall be concluded, it is provided that there shall be a hearing. Is it the Senator's judgment that that means there shall be a hearing before the President undertakes to negotiate a tentative agreement with a foreign country, or would it come after the tentative accord had been created?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the Senator appreciates that if we should let the other countries with which we are trying to reach a good bargaining agreement know everything that our people think and say, it might embarrass our negotiations. They probably may get that information, but there is no use to put all the cards on the table at the same time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that is right.

Mr. HARRISON. For that reason necessarily the hearings ought to be under rules and regulations prescribed by the President. I can only give the Senator my own idea. I imagine if the President contemplates entering into a trade agreement with some country, say Spain, there will be notice immediately published to the country that such action is contemplated and that interested persons may appear and make their protests or give their reasons and advice to the Secretary of State.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is that notice to be given before or after the subject has been discussed, for example, with Spain and a tentative arrangement has been reached?

Mr. HARRISON. I cannot say as to that. The Senator will appreciate that is true, because the rules and regulations have to be fixed by the President and his advisers. My opinion is that this is what ought to happen: Of course, negotiations will begin, but nothing that will bind this Government will be done until public notice shall have been given to all persons interested and they shall have had an opportunity to file their protests or give their views about the matter. They might cooperate with the Government, and they might desire to get the Government's viewpoint. In other words, nothing would be concluded that would bind this Government until our citizens had notice and opportunity to be heard.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that; but manifestly there would not be anything to submit to a hearing until there was a tentative agreement as to what commodity was to be treated here for what commodity over there.

Mr. HARRISON. I should imagine they would, of course, begin to have some conversations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is it not a fact that there would be a tentative conclusion of an agreement before the hearing would be held?

Mr. HARRISON. There would be a hearing first.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am trying to find out what "first" means. Is it before Spain is approached on the proposition, or is it after we have talked with Spain about the kind of bargain it is proposed to make?

Mr. HARRISON. I assume that what we would do before entering into one of these reciprocal trade agreements would be to find out, after conferences and counseling together, whether we wanted to take up with a country a certain proposition and see if we could trade along a certain line. That would be done first. Then we would have to feel out the other country to see whether or not it even wanted to confer. Before we conferred with them about it, if they desired to confer, we would give public notice, and so forth, and sound out the sentiment of the country. That would be done even before we had conversations with the other country, but after we had received some kind of assurance that the other country might be willing to talk along certain lines. Of course, what would be done with reference to that would have to be arranged at another place.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator stated earlier in the colloquy that obviously we could not tip off our hand in negotiating one of these bargains before we made the bargain; so I conclude from his observation—which is a very practical one—that there would be an approximate meeting of minds between our negotiators and the foreign negotiators before the public hearing would occur.

Mr. HARRISON. No; it is my opinion, from my conversations with those who would have in charge the administration of the measure, that naturally there would be no need to serve notice that we contemplated doing a certain thing and have a lot of people come in and protest, and so forth, or give their advice, unless the other country had been sounded out as to whether or not they would even listen to some kind of proposal. When our Government received the assurance that the other country would be glad to enter upon a conversation on a certain line, I imagine the notice would be given immediately, and the protests would be made, and the feeling of this country would be obtained.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator one further question? I understand that the present flexible tariff provision remains in all respects except the detail to which the Senator adverted.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, would we confront a situation where there would be two tariff-reducing powers in existence, and the President in the first instance could reduce the tariff 50 percent under his flexible power and then another 50 percent of the remainder under his bargaining power?

Mr. HARRISON. We do not disturb the present tariff at all except as to the agreements which may be made, and, of course, they are limited to 50 percent up or down; but if we should enter into an agreement with one country, and the Tariff Commission should take up the same article, I think they would have a right to go ahead and deal with it without affecting the trade agreement. I do not think anything could be done by this Government that would affect trade agreements we might have entered into.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, there would then be upon the statute books, through the combination of these two tariff-reducing powers, the power to reduce tariffs a total of 75 percent.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will see that on pages 2 and 3 the bill provides:

> No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand; but before the President undertook to apply this power he could use his flexible-tariff power first to reduce the duty 50 percent, and then he could use this trade-agreement power to reduce the remainder of the duty another 50 percent. I am asking if that is not the situation which would exist.

Mr. HARRISON. I think if the Tariff Commission tomorrow should recommend, and the recommendation should be approved by the President, the reduction of some tariff duty 50 percent, 30 percent, or what not, that would then be the existing rate; and the President could then negotiate treaties, and so forth, that might reduce that rate further.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, did the Senator say "negotiate treaties"?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; that was his language.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not mean "negotiate treaties." I meant he could enter into these reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has referred to his conversations with those who contemplate the administration of this measure, and the assurance, for instance, which he has received that there will be no reduction in the tariff on wool. Without intending to be controversial, I am wondering whether, in the course of those conversations, any specific possible bargain has been discussed to personify and illustrate the point about which we are talking. Is there any contemplated bargain which the Senator might suggest to me from his contact with the administration, or from his wide knowledge of the subject, which would illustrate the point about which we are talking?

Mr. HARRISON. I should hesitate to do that. I should get into hot water immediately.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I concede that it would be very dangerous.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Referring again to section 4, it says:

> Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government—

That contemplates that a trade agreement with a foreign country has been under consideration, but has not yet been concluded. I take it that the section is not obscure. It simply contemplates that these agreements will be talked over, and, in a measure, agreed upon. That is, in a measure the minds of the parties will have met; and then, before the agreement shall have been concluded, the President will take counsel of whomever he desires to hear from.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think they will go that far.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see how it could be otherwise as a practical proposition, because the bill says:

> Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded—

So that it contemplates a trade agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will notice further, while the bill does say "before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded", it also says "public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement * * * shall be given."

Mr. BORAH. That seems to be contradictory of the other provision. If the bill said in the first instance, "Before any foreign-trade agreement is negotiated", that would be one thing; but the Senator does not want that. Before starting in upon a negotiation, and before we had sounded out the other country, we could not give this notice to the country that we were going to do so and so. Our minds must necessarily in a measure have met with the minds of the foreign countries in an agreement; but the President will not conclude the agreement and bind himself until he has heard from his constituents.

Mr. HARRISON. Until these people shall have been heard.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it is the view of the Senator from Idaho, then, that the net result of the hearing is simply to assure the industry a seat at its own funeral?

Mr. BORAH. What I mean to say is that as a practical proposition, when we begin to negotiate, for instance, with Brazil—as I understand negotiations have been had now upon certain matters—we will not advertise to the United States that we are contemplating a negotiation with Brazil upon certain products or certain articles. We will first meet with Brazil, and in a measure we will meet the minds of the Brazilian representatives. After we have done so, before the matter is concluded, the parties at home will be given an opportunity to be heard. That, in my judgment, will be the practical working of the bill. Whether, as the Senator says, it simply means a seat at a funeral—if there is to be a funeral—that is true.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before the Senator from Mississippi takes his seat, I should like to propound just one question to him. It has been in a measure answered by the Senator from Idaho; but, as I understand this matter of calling in the interested parties before the trade agreement is concluded, it is in the nature of what would be done in a criminal case, where, after the defendant is convicted and a new trial is refused, the judge asks if he has any reason to state why sentence of the court should not be imposed. [Laughter.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 325) extending for 2 years the time within which American claimants may make application for payment, under the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission and the Tripartite Claims Commission, and extending until March 10, 1936, the time within which Hungarian claimants may make application for payment, under the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, of awards of the War Claims Arbiter, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. DOUGHTON, Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL, Mr. CULLEN, Mr. TREADWAY, and Mr. BACHARACH were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9061) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CANNON of Missouri, Mr. BLANTON, Mr. JACOBSEN, Mr. DITTER, and Mr. POWERS were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 8700) to establish a Code of Laws for the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the legislative scenes have been shifting rapidly during the past week. Within the past 5 or 6 days we have had four measures of major importance before the Senate for its consideration. We have had the stock-exchange bill; we have had the modification of the Securities Act; we have had the communications bill; and now we have the tariff bill. They have come upon us with such rapidity that no one has had opportunity thoroughly to study the hearings, or give to the subject matter the attention to which it is entitled.

I regret that there are not present today the Republican members of the Finance Committee who have heard the testimony adduced at the hearings, and are able adequately to present the Republican view of this question. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that we are not going to discuss the subject from a purely political and partisan standpoint; but certainly time should be given to every Member of the Senate to study this very great and important question.

I doubt if there are many Members of the Senate who have more than a superficial acquaintance with the measures which have been before this body during the past week. I have not had time to read all the testimony which has been taken on the pending bill, and the question I propounded to the able chairman of the committee a few moments ago was based wholly upon the theory that I feared the chairman himself had not given sufficient consideration to one of the most important and vital phases of this question; namely, if this great and unusual power is conferred, can we find, through its exercise, new markets for our surplus agricultural products?

After a colloquy the Senator finally assured me that it was not contemplated to include wool in the agricultural products that might be the subject of trade agreements. At this point I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi, inasmuch as he has given his assurance, so far as he could, and that of the Secretary of State that wool will not be the subject of trade agreements, whether the Senator will include the other basic commodities set forth in the Agricultural Adjustment Act?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I could not do that. I put in the RECORD what the Secretary of State said with reference to wool. What I said was my own idea about it.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that, and I like the frankness of the Senator. If, however, an amendment should be proposed to exclude agricultural commodities from the scope of this bill, would the Senator accept it?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what the Senate would do, but I should very much hope we would not get into a fight between agriculture and industry in this country, because if the Senator from Oregon or someone else should offer such an amendment as that and it should be adopted, I fear that just as great an effort might be made to exclude the products of industry generally, and that we might not have anything left; that the bird might be feathered before we got through. So I should oppose such an amendment as that.

Mr. McNARY. I think I somewhere read that the President did not intend, if given this power, or at least did not have in mind to decrease tariffs on agricultural products.

Mr. HARRISON. The President has made the statement in some of his speeches, and I think in his message he has said, that he is trying to help agriculture; but I should think it would be very bad, almost destructive, to write into this measure a provision that he must not under any circumstances negotiate with reference to agricultural products.

Mr. McNARY. I would not be a party to arraigning manufacturers against producers of agricultural products; but, inasmuch as the Senator has taken wool out of consideration, aided by the Secretary of State, and having admitted a moment ago that the President had expressed a desire not to injure agriculture by bringing it within the scope of the act, will the Senator accept an amendment along the line that all agricultural commodities produced in this country shall be exempt from any power exercised by the President to decrease rates thereon?

Mr. HARRISON. I should hope very much that such an amendment, if offered, would be defeated.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, to me, as one who comes from an agricultural State, it is a great disappointment that the Senator from Mississippi, who wants to express, in the best way he can, the wishes of his President, will not accept an amendment of that kind, which I am sure would shorten the debate, satisfy the agricultural interests of this country, and bring hope to those agriculturalists who are in Washington seeking the defeat of the pending measure.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator I thought when the opposition to this measure started out by asking for a provision allowing interested parties to be heard, and when I offered such an amendment and the provision was inserted in the bill, that we would be able to pass the bill almost by unanimous consent, and I now find that we cannot do that. I am sorry that I cannot agree to the other amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have just come into the Chamber, and I heard the statement made that it has just now been stated on the floor that wool is to be excepted from such agreements as may be made under the bill. Is that correct, may I ask?

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. No; that is not correct, may I say to the Senator. I am sorry the Senator from California did not hear my discussion of the wool question. I read a memorandum from the Secretary of State with reference to wool, and I stated as my own individual view that wool would not be included; but I bind nobody by my statement. I could not do so.

Mr. JOHNSON. In the corridors I was told the other day that the definite statement had been made that wool would be exempted, and that wool would not be interfered with at all. I was very glad to hear that statement, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the statement has been made in that way. Of course, the Senator appreciates that if the State Department, or the administration, those having this matter in charge, should say that any one particular commodity was not to be interfered with and would not be touched, there would be a tremendous demand for exemption of this, that, and the other.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. HARRISON. And that would be unfair. Consequently, we hope there will be no statement made with reference to the matter at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly the reason why I rose at this time. But I take it, from what the Senator says, that while there has been no positive agreement written, either into the bill or into the records of the Senate, there is a "gentlemen's agreement" somewhere that wool is to be excluded. I am interested in what is done with respect to wool, of course, but I am interested in what may happen as to some other commodities which are produced in the territory from which I come. May I ask whether the Senator will see to it that lemons, walnuts, and almonds are excluded as well?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator would have just as much right to get some assurance as to those matters as somebody else would have to get assurance as to some others.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly my view; and if wool is to be excluded from this bill, either by edict of the Secretary of State or by direct agreement in some other quarter, in order that Wyoming may profit thereby, as I hope Wyoming may, I do not see any reason on earth why California should not profit by the exemption of lemons, walnuts, almonds, and the like, the products which come from the soil of that State and for which we fought here during the last 14 years in various tariff contests, and protection for which finally we won. To take it from us now would leave us remediless, and no one could foresee the peril that would ensue.

Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McNARY. I yield first to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not despair of ultimately obtaining the consent of the Senator from Mississippi to the exemption which he asks, because I am confident that when the Senator from Mississippi further contacts the Secretary of State and the White House and gets another letter of instructions tomorrow the President will be found to be standing firmly on his statement at Baltimore on October 25, 1932:

> It is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products.

Surely there is not going to be resistance to the removal of any known absurdity which loiters in this pending tariff bill.

Mr. McNARY. I assure the Senator that I shall persist until the agricultural list is exhausted.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. It looks to me as if we could avoid a great deal of disagreement in considering this matter. If I understand the letter which the Senator from Mississippi has read, from what he terms "the powers that be", meaning, I suppose, the Secretary of State and other Cabinet officers, there is no intention of lowering the tariff on wool, and they censure the propaganda which has caused this falling off in the price of wool about 40 percent, for which they blame propaganda based upon the pending bill.

If this be the fact, why not get wool out of the way? Let us simplify the bill as we go along. The Chairman of the Committee on Finance, we recognize, knows what he is talking about, and if the Secretary of State knows what he is talking about, and wool is not to be interfered with, then the simpler we can make the bill the fewer will be the points of conflict left, and the better it will be.

Since that has been agreed to, the Secretary of Agriculture having said that wool will not be touched, and the Chairman of the Finance Committee having read his letter and having taken that view, why not exclude wool, and then go to the next commodity to see what we have to argue over?

I am going to vote with the Senator from California. I am going to stand by the President in his statement that it would be perfectly absurd to talk about lowering the tariffs on agricultural commodities. I am going to stand by the President if no other man in my party stands by him. I am going to be here backing him up on that proposition. But before we get to that, it seems to me that we ought to do everything possible to avoid confusion. I do not want to have to remain here and listen to a lot of unnecessary talk. If wool is to be exempted, and it is said that it will be, let us have it exempted, and then we will know where we are. Then I want to bring up the question of exempting sugar, because we have had several lickings on that lately.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I enjoyed the contents of the manuscript so carefully prepared by the Senator from Mississippi, as I enjoy all statements made by him and his speeches on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere. During the course of his discussion I expressed disappointment that not sufficient information had been given by him in a particular way regarding markets for surplus American products to justify the submission to Congress of this proposal by the President.

The Senator admitted he was dealing in generalities. We had a specific illustration as to wool. Was any testimony taken which would substantiate the remark upon the part of the President and the Senator from Mississippi that other agricultural commodities, raised in various sections of the country, would not be touched by a lowering of the tariff duties, or used in bargaining over rates on products of other countries? To that question there has been no answer.

I think that is vital to the discussion of this measure. I think information should be given on the floor of the Senate, from those conversant with this important measure, as to how the law is to be applied. In what fashion is the President to use his extraordinary power? Will it be used upon manufactured goods, or upon agricultural commodities? Will it be used to the preference of the South and the detriment of the West? Will it be used to help the East, and will the Middle West be left untouched? Those are questions which I thought the able Senator from Mississippi would discuss in connection with his manuscript today.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, that requires no discussion on my part, because the Senator does not believe that the President of the United States—and I know he has a very high regard for him—would permit, in negotiating any trade agreements, that they should be employed to the disadvantage of one section as against another, or of one class as against another. I am sure the Senator believes that the President would deal fairly with every section and with all interests of the country.

Mr. McNARY. I have a high regard for the President of the United States. I know he can give but little time and but spare attention to the execution of this proposal if it becomes a law. I know that if it is to be worth anything it must be made use of and properly administered. I know that if some articles are to be traded off they must be traded to the detriment of that section of the country where they are produced or converted. That is a simple fact.

I might give as an illustration the case, unfortunate to California but exceedingly fortunate to the States of Oregon and Washington, where apples and pears were traded off for wines manfactured in France to the detriment of wines of equal quality produced in California. That is an illustration of power recently exercised.

Let me say again to the Senator that another illustration came before us some weeks ago. In that case complaint was made by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. In the Agricultural Adjustment Act there is a section which permits the Secretary of Agriculture to levy a processing tax upon competitive articles not enumerated in the act as basic commodities, and one morning the potato growers of Idaho and various sections of the country, and producers of fruits and vegetables in California, found there was a processing tax on jute bags. Without any notice that great power was arbitrarily exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture and the price of jute bags advanced 30 to 40 percent. What the Senator from Idaho called attention to on that occasion, Mr. President, is something which can again happen if we confer this tremendous power on the President of the United States. I have before me the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5892, and on that page appears a plaintive statement, but one expressing the very situation which will obtain if this power shall be given to the President:

It is an extraordinary situation that presents itself.

Said the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—

Here is the taxing power of the United States under the Constitution—the Congress—and yet here we find a tax which the Congress did not impose and cannot remove or remedy. The Congress has seen fit to delegate away its taxing power to such an extent that the only power we now have is, as it were, in the nature of a petition to the authority to whom we have delegated the power which the Constitution dedicated or confided to the Congress. I am exercising today, therefore, with due humility, I trust, the right of petition as a Senator of the United States, petitioning a department of the Government to relieve my people of an unjust and exorbitant tax. Shorn of all power to repeal the tax, Congress may petition.

All I am interested in now is relief, and I am pursuing the only course I know by which to get a hearing. Of course, I may say that the able Secretary of Agriculture is exercising properly the power which was granted to him. I am not complaining of a usurpation of power or an exercise of power which has not been delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Congress was generous and gave abundantly of its power. If there is fault anywhere, it is with the Congress and not with the Secretary of Agriculture—not with the "brain trust", but with the Congress. It is amusing to hear Congress talk about investigating the "brain trust" when the Congress has passed every bill I know of that the "brain trust" has suggested.

Mr. President, those are the plaintive words of the Senator from Idaho.

I recall in that connection that when the Agricultural Adjustment Act was before the Senate I specifically pointed out the unusual power proposed to be lodged in the Secretary of Agriculture and what might arbitrarily be done against some section of the country. Those words were scarcely dry in print until the able Senator from Idaho spoke the truth when he said that that power had been exercised against a section of the country.

Let me continue in that same regard——

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. In that connection an illustration of the exercise of the taxing power by an individual can be found in my own State. The Secretary of Agriculture, as the Senator knows, was authorized to levy compensatory taxes when he feared there might be a shift away from cotton to an excessive use of a competing commodity, and so, for illustration, there was levied a so-called "compensatory tax" upon paper cement bags, and there was also levied a compensatory tax on paper towels, both of which happen to be made in the State of Maine; and, figured on the basis of use, the increase in the tax on the paper bags was about 600 percent, and the increase in the tax, on the basis of use, in the case of paper towels was from 1,100 percent to 1,300 percent more than the rate of the processing tax on cotton.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate the contribution of the Senator from Maine.

The erudite Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], in supporting the Senator from Idaho, had this to say, which is to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the page following that from which I just read:

Then we talk of reciprocal trade agreements, and we tell about how we are going to take our products and carry them here and there and some other place beyond the seas and relieve our farmers of the difficulties which have been encountered by them, when, within the borders of our own country, we are levying by one man's dictum—

Referring to the Secretary of Agriculture—

a tax today that is ruinous upon the 4, 5, 6, or 7 States situated on the west coast.

For these reasons I unite with the Senator from Idaho in the protest he has made concerning this tax. I have only a protest to make, it is quite true, but the protest thus I make.

Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has said, and other Senators will say, that the President does not desire to do any section of the country wrong. I concur in that statement. The President of the United States will not have all to do with the exercise of this power. Someone unwittingly, or someone desiring to extend our commerce with foreign countries, will bring about such a condition as the Secretary of Agriculture brought about concerning jute bags.

If the power is to be exercised, Mr. President, it may be exercised injuriously to every product which is on the dutiable list.

I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question. If the power, which I think is contemplated by the language of the bill, shall be exercised upon those products on the dutiable list, necessarily those who are raising or manufacturing such products will come into competition with the producers of foreign products of a similar character. That is self-evident. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi that with respect to those products which are on the free list the President may exercise this power with regard to trade agreements?

Mr. HARRISON. As the Senator will recall, the bill expressly gives to the President two powers; not only the power to enter into foreign-trade agreements, but—

To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions—

He has the power to put into these trade agreements quotas if he wants to, sanitary restrictions if he wants to, and quarantine restrictions if he wants to.

Mr. McNARY. That is the question I desire to develop. Let us take, for instance, coffee which enters this country from Brazil. We do not produce any coffee. I think the importation of coffee into this country from Brazil runs in excess of $100,000,000 annually, touching the gross annual value of the imports. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi that the President could enter into a trade agreement with Brazil that no coffee would be acceptable at the ports of this country unless Brazil should take from us an equal value of automobiles or other products of the factories of this country?

Mr. HARRISON. He could do so, of course, if Brazil would enter into such an agreement; but I doubt if Brazil would enter into such an agreement, and, of course, there is no power conferred upon the President except that which may be exercised by entering into reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. McNARY. But has the President the power to say to Brazil, "We will place an embargo upon your exportations of coffee to the United States unless you will take an equal amount of American products of the farm and the factory"?

Mr. HARRISON. Not unless Brazil would enter into such an agreement as that. We give to the President no power outside of making agreements, and in making the agreements he can then impose additional restrictions, such as quotas, and so on. But we do not give him the power to browbeat some country and say to it, "If you do not do so and so we are going to do this to you." The President now has certain powers under the law with reference to countervailing duties and antidumping, and such powers as we give to him in the N.R.A. legislation, and in imposing embargoes, and with regard to the codes. But we do not give him such powers as referred to just now by the Senator from Oregon. We do not disturb such situations at all.

Mr. McNARY. That is what I want to know, because, in my judgment, the Senator knows more about this peculiar proposal than anyone else in the Senate on the Democratic side. I want to know if the President could place an embargo against the importation of coffee into this country, or provide quotas limiting the amount of coffee to come in, unless Brazil or other coffee-producing countries would agree to purchase a like amount of our products.

Mr. HARRISON. He could not do that under this proposal.

Mr. McNARY. Does not the Senator think that should be done?

Mr. HARRISON. No; we do not seek to do that under this proposal.

Mr. McNARY. Then, I will give another illustration. We import something like $104,000,000 of silk annually from Japan. Would it not be fair, would it not be proper, would it not be in the interest of the American Republic, if the President should say to Japan, "We will exclude the major portion of your silk from the market of America unless you agree, under this power given me, to take an equal amount of products from the farms or factories of the United States"?

Mr. HARRISON. There is nothing that would estop the President from saying that to the particular country; but under this proposal he could not do that unless Japan should enter into an agreement. What is done under this measure must be reciprocally done. We do not give the President any power to browbeat any nation into anything, the purpose being to get a market abroad and have an exchange of goods which will work to the advantage of both countries.

Mr. McNARY. Does not the Senator think we could give power to the President to deal with other countries that use our great market for their own benefit? Should we not permit him, if the power is not already granted, to deal with Japan and Brazil in the fashion I suggested a few moments ago?

Mr. HARRISON. The President and the Tariff Commission already have the right to increase tariff duties 50 percent on commodities imported into this country.

Mr. McNARY. I am speaking about articles on the free list and which the President and the Tariff Commission cannot place on the dutiable list.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think, and I am sure the Senator from Oregon does not think, that we could give to the Tariff Commission the power to take an article from the free list and put it on the dutiable list without requiring that the action be referred back to Congress for its approval.

Mr. McNARY. What I wanted to do——

Mr. HARRISON. That is the only reason, may I say to the Senator? If we could do it constitutionally, I would see no objection. As the Senator will recall, in the amendment which we adopted, and which President Hoover vetoed—Mr. Collier introduced it in the House, and I helped to steer it through the Senate—giving to the Tariff Commission certain powers, but requiring that action taken by the Commission should be referred back to Congress for consideration, we gave them the power to take an article from the dutiable list and put it on the free list and vice versa from the free list to the dutiable list, but I doubt very seriously whether we could clothe the Tariff Commission or the President or anyone else with the power of taking an article from the free list and putting it on the dutiable list without reference to Congress. That is why we have left that phase of it out of this measure, and why we put in the other provision as to additional restrictions on which the bargaining countries might mutually agree, such as quotas, and so forth.

Mr. McNARY. The ambition I have is to make some contribution to the betterment of this measure, and it occurs to me that it would probably strengthen the proposal if we should give the power to the President to deal with commodities now on the free list, and which we do not produce in this country, rather than to give him the power to deal only with those commodities in the production and sale of which we compete with other nations. Will the Senator agree to a proposition to authorize the President to enter into reciprocal trade agreements as to articles which are on the free list, giving him the right to place a sufficient tariff on them to bring about an agreement, an embargo, or to superimpose a quota?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator asks me whether I would favor a provision under which an article which is now on the free list might have a quota established against it or a duty placed upon it. I ask him in return, does he not think that if such an arrangement as that should be made, the same arrangement ought to be made with reference to articles that are now on the dutiable list with reference to putting them on the free list? I have heard suggestions made by certain Senators on the other side to the effect that proposals might be submitted under which an article now on the free list could be placed on the dutiable list, but nothing was said with reference to taking the tariff off a dutiable article and putting that article on the free list. I understood the Senator to agree with me that the principle ought to work both ways.

Mr. McNARY. I am not admitting that that suggestion is pertinent or is in the least in my thought, but I do say frankly to the Senator, who is in charge of the bill, that with those countries which raise silk, rubber, spices, tin, and coffee some arrangement should be made whereby we receive some benefit from them in exchange for the market we afford their products. Will the Senator listen to me to the extent in this connection of saying to him that where we import from other countries hundreds of millions of dollars annually of products, which we ourselves do not produce, I think some power should be given to the President to encourage those nations thus using this as their market to buy from us reciprocally some of our products equal in value to those which we buy from them. The Senator says that that power is not contained in the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think, unless an agreement could mutually be entered into, that any other countries would agree to such a proposal.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator think it is fair to select dutiable or competitive goods wholly, and make them subject to reciprocal trade agreements, overlooking the great volume of imports which come in free of duty?

Mr. HARRISON. I say to the Senator that if I thought we had the authority, and it could be upheld by the courts, I should be very glad to broaden the provision to include the power to take commodities from the dutiable list and put them on the free list and take them from the free list and put them upon the dutiable list; but I do not believe such a legislative enactment would be upheld, and that is the only reason why the suggestion was not accepted.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the judgment of the able Senator from Mississippi that such an act would be unconstitutional?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Then, I understand the only doubt under which the Senator is suffering is the fact that he believes such legislation would be unconstitutional, but, as an economic proposition and one that would be just to the producers and consumers of America, he thinks it would be well so to provide?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would be well to confer the power if we could grant it constitutionally; but I would not rather restrict it as the Senator would, if I understood him correctly, because I would let it work both ways, and allow articles to be placed on the dutiable list from the free list or to be removed from the free list to the dutiable list, in the bargaining process.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator, then, accept an amendment along that line and take it to conference and in the meantime confer with his own good mind and the constitutional lawyers of the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON. No; and for the reason, I am sorry to say, that that question has already been given a very great deal of consideration by those who formulated this proposed legislation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall hurry along in the desultory remarks which I am making.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me before he leaves the subject he was just discussing?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator from Oregon has put his finger squarely upon one of the major vices of the pending legislation. We are admitting into the United States $900,000,000 worth of foreign goods free, gratis, for nothing, without a penny's tariff. That volume of imports represents 60 percent of our foreign purchases. We are proposing now to embark upon a bargaining program without charging the foreigner one single penny for $900,000,000 worth of advantage which he already enjoys in this market. Our best chance for bargains is foreclosed. We start with that handicap; we put ourselves $900,000,000 behind before we ever begin to bargain. It is a perfectly absurd arrangement.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator overlooks that it would be unconstitutional to do the thing he first suggested.

Mr. HARRISON. If I may ask the Senator from Michigan a question—I imagine that he has in view rubber, for instance, which comes in free? Would the Senator be in favor of putting a tariff on rubber?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Michigan would be willing to propose to put a tariff on rubber—assuming that any bargains at all are to be made—if it were necessary in order to drive a proper tariff bargain reciprocally with countries from which we buy rubber. But the Senator from Michigan is opposed to the use of any such bargaining power in respect either to the free or dutiable list. I simply point out that bargains are futile unless the free list is included.

Mr. HARRISON. It is the Senator's viewpoint that we have the power to do that?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think we have the power, if we have the power to do any of the things which are proposed by the bill. I do not believe the power exists at all. If it exists in one respect, it would exist in the other.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, passing on to another subject, and again referring to the very pleasant and erudite Senator from Mississippi, I understand his position today is that he believes the constitutional power to do what I have suggested is lacking. I recall, Mr. President, most agreeably, the discussion of the tariff bill of 1930, when the able Senator from Mississippi declared himself forcefully, as a member of the Senate Finance Committee, against transferring power of this character to the President of the United States at that time, saying it was unconstitutional. That was in connection with the flexible provisions of the tariff act. The Senator then was a student of legal and economic questions, as he is today. The former Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Simmons, was at that time Chairman of the Finance Committee. Much of the work was left to the able Senator from Mississippi, who gave that particular subject matter very great thought. I recall that he most forcefully voiced his opposition to such a provision as is now in this bill, though in this instance the power is proposed to be given in a less restricted sense.

I refer, Mr. President, to a statement signed by the Senator from Mississippi, a portion of which I will read. I read it in no sense by way of criticism, for I agree with the aphorism that great men are permitted to change their views; and the Senator from Mississippi is a great man. At that time, after considerable study, he thought it would be ruinous to the country if the Congress should abdicate its power to legislate in this body and turn it over to the President of the United States. The language is so eloquent that I cannot, without reference to the RECORD, quote it accurately. I read:

> We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary and what we believe to be unconstitutional authority passes now from the Congress, it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.
> It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff and regulation of commerce thereby will be made by the Executive. It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress, where it is such an embarrassing business, as everybody knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So, also, it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.
> In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his Government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.
> In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad and public view of this important public question, we make this appeal.

Among the signers was the very able Senator from Mississippi, the author of the measure now before us and who today has presented the first speech in its advocacy.

I have read the eloquent words penned by the able Senator from Mississippi against the flexible provisions whereby some power was transferred by the Congress to the President, when the Senator said, in a voice strong and filled with emotion, that "if it is done today the power will never come back to Congress, and therefore we appeal to the American people to support us in our opposition to giving this great power to the President"—which, parenthetically, is not the only power which it is now proposed by the Senator to confer upon the President of the United States. Has the Senator now, after deep study and meditation and prayer, changed his views? Of course he has that right.

Mr. HARRISON. Is that the question the Senator wishes to ask me?

Mr. McNARY. I think that is sufficient unto the hour.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator wanted to ask me whether it was an eloquent speech.

Mr. McNARY. I said it was an eloquent speech, a very forceful speech, and the ablest speech the Senator ever made.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I have been here too long to believe I can be consistent all the time in all things. I have voted on different questions in different ways, and probably sometimes expressed myself in an inconsistent way. The situation which at that time confronted the country, as the Senator is well aware, was such that we had made a tremendous fight with reference to the high rates the country faced when we enacted the Fordney-McCumber tariff law and when we carried on in the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. Under the flexible provisions proposed at that time, as the Senator will remember, in practically every instance the rates were increased still higher, inordinately high, and only in the rarest instance were the rates lowered.

We were trying to take away from the President the power to increase those rates still higher. I felt and my colleagues of the minority on the committee felt at that time that it should not be done, and that is why we opposed the flexible provisions. Of course, the Supreme Court has declared the grant of power to be within the constitutional functions of Congress and that the law is constitutional. But I can see a marked difference between giving the President the power to increase tariff rates as prescribed at that time, and giving him the power to enter into reciprocal trade agreements which are designed to sell our surplus goods, designed to build up an international trade, designed to help the economic condition of the country.

If the Senator wants to consider that an inconsistency upon my part, he may do so.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator has made a lame explanation. I do not hold it against him. I think he was right 4 years ago.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe the Senator voted with us, did he not—or does the Senator recall?

Mr. McNARY. I do not recall my vote, but I know it was right. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I know it was right, too. I merely asked for information. I am not sure, but I have the feeling that the Senator was right and voted with us at that time.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator does not remember having voted on this very important question 2 years ago. Apparently it was not of as much importance then as it is now, in the opinion of the minority leader.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not going to cover the whole subject matter today. I repeat, and I hesitate to repeat, that I think the Senator from Mississippi, who at that time was more or less in charge of the bill and gave the subject matter very great study, was pioneering in a new field and knew precisely what limitations should be placed upon the President. When that bill was passed by the Congress and became a law, there were limitations placed about the power of the President which are not to be found in the pending measure. I am satisfied if at that time we had proposed to give carte blanche to the Chief Executive without the advice of the Tariff Commission, the power to act independently and practically without notice, the able Senator from Mississippi would even more vigorously, if possible, have opposed the grant of such power.

I am not going to accuse him of inconsistency. I know that new situations require new viewpoints—from the Democrats! [Laughter.] I shall only remark in passing that I was surprised when the Senator from Mississippi, whom I know so well and so affectionately regard, made the first and opening speech in favor of a bill which would involve forsaking a principle for which he contended a few years ago.

Mr. President, the question has arisen, Who opposes the measure? It cannot be said that all the Republicans of the country oppose it. A great majority do. I know some Republicans, one of whom was mentioned today, who favor in a small degree the enactment of the bill into law. But I know that the great majority of the American people who belong to the Republican Party disapprove of the measure.

One of the great organizations of the country that has not taken any active part in politics, which represents the agrarians of the country in a large measure, is the National Grange. They have an organization of probably 2,000,000 men and women. It would be interesting to know what that great nonpolitical organization thinks about the measure. I had no apprehension as to what their final attitude would be. I have been a member of the organization for years. They compose, in my opinion, the solid thought of America. They have taken action on this question, and at this time for the benefit of the RECORD and those few who may read the RECORD, and at least for my own pleasure, I am going to give to the Senate the views of this great organization.

This is a statement by the Washington representative of the National Grange. I shall read only excerpts from it, in order to shorten the time that I shall occupy the attention of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the entire statement may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McNARY. This statement says:

Since the surplus problem has been one of the most difficult with which agriculture has had to deal in recent years, it naturally follows that the farmers of the United States are eager to find an export market for their products, provided the home market is not sacrificed in bringing this about. However, we cannot overlook the fact that the home market is all important in American agriculture. The best market for American farm products and in the case of many crops the only market, is to be found in the United States. * * *.

Among the objections to the pending bill are:

1. As it is now written, that feature of the measure which authorizes the President to proclaim modifications of existing duties and "other import restrictions" is so sweeping that it would be possible to bring cattle into this country having the foot-and-mouth disease. It would also make it possible to set aside the Lenroot-Taber Milk Act, providing that imported milk must conform to the same sanitary requirements as are in force domestically. That provision of the present revenue bill which imposes an excise tax upon certain imported oils could be voided; the antidumping laws could be suspended and convict-made goods could be imported into the country under the present wording of the bill. Import restrictions enter into all these matters.

2. Our whole recovery program aims to raise the American price level above the world level. For the time being at least everybody seems to approve of that. Under the N.R.A. we have adopted the 40-hour week in industry; there is a possibility that before Congress adjourns legislation may be enacted making the 30-hour week mandatory in industry, and we have abolished child labor. Naturally, all this increases our cost of production. It follows, therefore, that we must have proper protection, or American producers would speedily be deprived of their own market by a flood of imports from abroad. When I say "proper protection", I do not mean the kind of protection that breeds monopoly, enriching the few at the expense of the many.

3. Everybody agrees that tariff tinkering unsettles business and creates uncertainties. That is true even when the tinkering is done in the open and everybody knows what is going on. The more secrecy there would be in negotiating reciprocal trade arrangements, the greater would be the uncertainty. It would seem that the bill should make provision for public hearings before agreements are consummated.

Mr. President, I think it is fair for me to say, and it is proper that I should say, that that paragraph was penned before there was incorporated in the bill the Finance Committee's amendment which suggests some form of notice; but, in my opinion, does not completely give to those affected the notice to which they are entitled. I make that remark, however, because I think this language was placed in this document before the bill was liberalized by action of the committee.

I proceed:

4. The bill provides that after a trade agreement has been negotiated, section 336 of the Tariff Act shall become inoperative so far as the commodity covered by any particular agreement is concerned. This means that regardless of how conditions might change, necessitating lowering or raising of tariff rates, it would be impossible to make any changes.

5. While the bill is to be in force for only 3 years, the prospects are if it is passed, the people will never regain the power they now have to frame their own tariff laws.

Mr. President, the executive representatives of the great organization known as the "National Grange" must have been reading the speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], made 4 years ago, when he said, as I recalled a few moments ago, that if this power is ever transferred from the Congress it will never again be lodged in that body. So the Grange fears that if this unusual power shall be given to the President of the United States, Congress will never regain it; it will be an abandoned jurisdiction.

6. Since the Presidency is a man-killing job, and the President cannot possibly give his personal attention to more than a small fraction of the matters already devolving upon him, he would necessarily have to delegate to others the functions of negotiating tariff treaties. This means that the power to make reciprocal trade agreements would largely be delegated to the Department of State or some other agency of the Government.

To my satisfaction and gratification and somewhat to my surprise, earlier in the day, while the Senator from Mississippi was discussing this bill, he produced a letter from the Secretary of State taking out of the jurisdiction of this bill and the authority of the President any power or desire to decrease the duties on wool or in any way to enter into reciprocal treaties affecting wool. That is an illustration of what will occur. The President has not the time to deal with these matters. He will leave to the Secretary of State—a capable and able international statesman, but a free trader at heart—possibly the negotiation of some of these treaties. The task will have to be delegated to someone. The President himself has not the time to take care of the functions of government imposed upon him by the statutes that have been passed from time to time. If now we thrust this great power upon him, it is not to be expected that he will have the time, the patience, or the opportunity to give the subject the consideration which a commission would give it and which the Congress has given it during much of the history of the country.

I repeat:

This means that the power to make reciprocal trade agreements would largely be delegated to the Department of State or some other agency of the Government.

I cited a few moments ago, in that connection, the complaint made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], supported by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], about the arbitrary power exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture when he declared jute to be a competitive product to cotton, and placed a processing tax on that competitive industry which, the Senator from California said, injuriously affected the producers in seven or eight States of the Union. So, Mr. President, I concur with the National Grange in the statement that when this power is conferred and used, it must necessarily result in abuse and injustice to some.

The danger is that under these circumstances the needs and wants of our farmers might be subordinated to questions involving international relationships.

That is the frank statement of the representative of the National Grange.

I have had an opportunity to confer with the representatives of the American Farm Bureau Federation, one of the large agricultural organizations, whose membership is limited wholly to the rural population. I think I am justified in saying that every farm organization in the country and most of the farmers of the country will be possessed of fear, and will entertain doubts as to market conditions, and the possibility of selling and marketing so long as this measure shall be on the statute books. In the instance I cited, regarding wool, it was admitted, I think, by the Senator from Mississippi, that the reason why it was taken out of the power granted by the President was because the market became demoralized through the fear of the producers of the country that some trade agreement might be made in relation thereto.

It is fear which has done more to disturb the market conditions and the commerce in an article and its trading than any other one factor that might be introduced into a situation. If fear is entertained that the price of an article will be lowered or that the duty upon it will be decreased, whether or not it is done, it prevents long-time marketing agreements, and I am convinced that unless the Senator from Mississippi will be so kind as to accept the proposal I made earlier in the day to exclude from the jurisdiction of this bill all agricultural commodities there will be much unrest among the agrarian population of America.

I have not been advised during the time I have had to consider this subject, which has been greatly limited by reason of other work, what the attitude of the laboring man of the country will be; but I do know that during all the tariff discussion which has taken place in the Congress in connection with all the tariff bills which have been enacted labor has found itself on the side of adequate protection of American industry. I recur, however, to a statement from Matthew Woll, found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 3999, where he makes some observations that may indicate the attitude of labor.

Mr. Matthew Woll is vice president of the American Federation of Labor, chairman of America's Wage Earners' Protective Conference, and president of the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. In a speech which he made on March 6 before the Bar Association of New York he indicated his violent opposition to this measure. I shall not ask that the entire speech be printed in the RECORD of today, because I am referring now to a statement which has already been embodied in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; but for the purpose of indicating that my view is well founded that labor will oppose this measure, I bring to the attention of the Senate the remarks of Mr. Woll, who is one of their leading representatives.

I commend the whole article to those who are interested in a fair discussion of this subject. It was not prepared from the standpoint of labor only, but also from the standpoint of those who desire to enjoy the benefits of our institutions, which they should receive through protection from lower costs in foreign countries.

What is now proposed is not alone the authorization of the President to enter into reciprocal trade treaties based on a bargaining flexibility of 50 percent of the present tariff duties, either upward or downward, but the consummation of such treaties without previous hearing to domestic parties and interests affected and without the necessity of approval by Congress. Thus it is proposed, first and foremost, to alter our constitutional division of power by having Congress abdicate its duty and responsibility under the Constitution to approve or disapprove treaties entered into with other nations with respect to trade relations.

Is America prepared to take this step?

That is a very pertinent inquiry.

Are we willing that hereafter exclusive control over our imports or exports shall rest solely with the President? It is, of course, argued that with imports and exports of European and Asiatic nations largely a matter of exclusive government control, to be exercised not through parliamentary channels but by "order in council" and like methods, that we can no longer trust such matters to our Congress. Are we ready to admit, as well as accept, the doctrine that democracy in international relations has failed and that the logic and force of events in Europe and Asia will compel us to alter our form of government and of institutions within its borders?

If it be the judgment that for practical efficiency Congress must no longer be trusted with joint treaty-making power in the matter of trade relations, why ought not sole authority be delegated to the President in dealing with agreements relating to international public debts, disarmament, and the like? Are we not thus hastening a time when power to be exercised by the President will be greater than the power of former kings, czars, and emperors?

Labor has implicit confidence in the present incumbent of the Presidency of the United States and has implicit faith and confidence in his humanitarian instinct and in his desire to maintain and hold secure our democratic ideals, ideas, and institutions. We are confident he is actuated solely by a desire to get our people and our institutions out of the terrible chaos into which we had drifted. But labor is without knowledge of the certainties of life and who may succeed him or when. In addition, powers of government should not be granted because of faith in any one individual temporarily in authority. Power once delegated is difficult to limit, regulate, or annul.

That is similar to language used in the famous resolution subscribed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Are we not thus building a dangerous structure for the future, even if it be confined to reciprocal trade treaties? Who knows what the future has in store and to what end we are building a permanent structure on the basis of meeting an emergency by devices of expediency?

Then, too, it must be clear that the motive underlying is to promote foreign trade by holding forth bargaining opportunities to foreign manufacturers in the American market.

That is precisely as we argued a while ago when discussing with the Senator from Mississippi the advantages of going to the free list, so that there would not be the competition which is feared by the ones dealing with commodities on the dutiable list.

Today the industrial nations of Europe and Asia have adopted American methods and means of production. Indeed, one nation in Asia is possessed of the most modern of industrial equipment. In addition, a number of the highly modernized plants in foreign countries are either owned or were financed by American surplus wealth and American skill. Those foreign American-owned plants are today, in part, supplying the world markets, thus precluding to that extent possible export trade on our part. Indeed, in a number of instances they have invaded our domestic market with the product of their foreign factories to the distinctive loss of employment of American workers.

Mr. President, without any desire, with no purpose whatsoever, to be tiresome, I commend this article in its fullness to every Member of the Senate. Everyone who wishes to treat American labor fairly, to see that it is employed, should consult this article by Mr. Woll, which, unhappily, has not been given the publicity which it should have received.

I stated a few moments ago that I had no personal knowledge, other than from this statement of Mr. Woll, of what the attitude of labor would be, but all through the years, when it came to schedules and policies and rates, labor has upheld the hands of those who were willing to vote and work for adequate protection to American manufacture, to American industry, and to American labor.

It is not my intention to detain the Senate long. I have had hastily to gather these facts together. There is one phase of the question which I desire to discuss with a little more care, without any desire to enter into all the factors involved in this subject matter. Others will discuss the constitutional delegation of power, if it be constitutional, the arbitrary power sought to be given to the President, and other phases of the problem.

I intend to be content, in conclusion, with discussing for a few moments a question which involves in my mind a subject matter of very great interest to the business men, producers, and manufacturers of the country.

When the bill was prepared in the House it contained a provision, which I thought was very inadequate, concerning public notice to be given to parties affected. I am frank to admit that the amendment incorporated in the bill by the Senate Finance Committee has somewhat improved the measure, but I still think it is inadequate and unfair and unjust to people who may be brought within the scope of its provisions and of the power we are about to confer upon the President.

Mr. President, it is my purpose briefly to direct attention to one phase of the proposed reciprocal tariff powers which in itself I regard as a sufficiently drastic departure from our tried and tested ways of government to justify stout opposition to the pending bill.

As the bill passed the House, no manufacturer or merchant, no agriculturist, or mine or timber operator, would have the right to be heard with reference to any reductions in duties that might be negotiated under these powers.

In the bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance there is an amendment which provides that before any foreign trade agreement shall be concluded public announcement of the intention to negotiate such an agreement shall be made in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. While this is an improvement over the condition that would prevail without the amendment, I do not see how it is possible to argue that such a provision is sufficient to be fair and equitable to the parties who may be affected by any reductions in rates that might be forthcoming with the conclusion of a trade agreement.

I do not want to quibble or to be unjust in my interpretation of the opportunity to be afforded in giving interested persons a chance to present their views. However, it is very significant that the administration's representatives in testifying before the House and Senate committees in support of this bill emphasized the need of secrecy and dispatch if agreements were to be consummated favorable to the interests of the United States. It is even more significant that there is absolutely no formula provided in the bill by which we are to judge the reasonableness of making concessions in duties. Repeated attempts to obtain an expression of opinion on such matters from representatives of the administration were either evaded or answered in the most general terms, and it is against such an unknown quantity that interested parties are to be allowed to present their views.

I repeat, that earlier in the day I asked the Senator from Mississippi, who so ably represents the Finance Committee, to give us some idea of what we might expect under these unusual powers we are asked to confer upon the President, but, as happened when that information was sought from those who appeared before the committee, the information was not forthcoming.

The hearings held daily before various legislative bodies are a constant reminder of the extent to which this procedure has become an integral part of our lives. For all these proceedings there is a carefully developed course of procedure. It is now proposed that we should abandon this procedure, and place in the hands of a small group of men the authority to upset at will the protection on which these people depend.

It is not reasonable to presume that any man who firmly believes his enterprise to be worthy and efficient would regard himself and his industry as under suspicion, yet, as far as the law is concerned, it may well be that such a man and such an enterprise might be under suspicion. The very fact that there is no stipulation as to what tests shall be applied when certain enterprises are selected for sacrifice means that in many instances an adverse judgment will be rendered without the victim ever having an opportunity to raise his voice in protest.

That is also a reminder of the statement made a while ago by the Senator from Mississippi, who did not answer the inquiry as to whether he had changed his views of policies or principles when he protested loudly for an opportunity to be heard if the flexible-tariff provision was to be enacted into law.

Such a reversal of tactics is all the more tragic when we pause to realize the extent to which these same people have been giving largely of their time and energy in an effort to mold workable organizations under the many elements of our domestic recovery legislation.

Of course, it will be said—in fact, the President himself said at Wheeling, W.Va., in the course of his campaign—that American labor need have no fear of being stripped of protection against ruinous, unfair foreign competition. But how can the President keep such a promise if he inaugurates a program of tariff bargaining, the very basis of which is an increase in our competitive imports? Four years ago, when we passed the Tariff Act of 1930, we provided in it an effective machinery, through the Tariff Commission, whereby any rate in excess of the difference between foreign and domestic costs might be reduced by the President by as much as 50 percent. We gave to the importers the right to seek such a reduction in duties. A tariff rate is either protective or it is nonprotective; and if the latter, it makes no difference how nonprotective it is. A competitive tariff rate or a revenue-only tariff rate is in the same class with free trade so far as protecting American industry, American agriculture, and American labor against foreign competition in our own markets is concerned.

To be effective, the President's plan must reduce the rates on our competitive imports below protective levels. Otherwise, how can his plan bring about an increase in such imports? The President's program, in other words, however disguised it may be or however indirect it may work out, means an abandonment of our protective-tariff policy. I make this statement without fear of contradiction, and let him who wants further proof of it read the first half dozen words in the Democratic 1932 tariff pledge which the President accepted wholeheartedly and without reservations. Those first half dozen words pledged the Democratic Party to a competitive tariff for revenue. A competitive tariff for revenue, however it is accomplished, is not a protective tariff. So again I say that the adoption of the President's reciprocity trade program means an abandonment of the protective-tariff policy. An abandonment perhaps by a back door or left-handed method, but an abandonment nevertheless, by the President under an unwise, and, it may be, unconstitutional delegation of power by the Congress.

No one in public or private service has his time so completely employed as the President of the United States. If his time were multiplied by 10, he would be short on time and long on work. Indeed, Mr. President, it is a fanciful and fallacious observation to suggest that the President has the time or the sources to search or the resources to explore to give adequate consideration to the true test of tariff making, namely, the difference between the cost of domestic and foreign production. Necessarily he must rely upon some other agency. It is a serious thing for us to face the possibility that under these broad powers the representative chosen by the President might see fit to reduce the duty on any commodities in our existing tariff schedules without having prescribed the tests which would be applied before a duty was reduced, and affording an opportunity for a hearing in such a manner that an industry may know it is in the position to be acquainted with the yardstick which will be applied in passing judgment on a situation.

I called attention a few moments ago to the fact that during the course of the hearings every effort was made to obtain from representatives of the administration some indication as to the standards that they would employ and the technique they would follow in settling upon the rate reductions that should be made in the course of completing a bargain. It is significant that no specific answers were forthcoming and that the representatives of the administration chose to confine their testimony to a series of general propositions. The law provides no test, no formula by which the President's representatives are to be guided in the completion of any trade agreement. The producers of these products are left to rely upon the promise of our Chief Executive that "no sound and important American interest will be injuriously disturbed."

I would be among the last to question the integrity or the good faith of our President in any action that he might take personally under the exercise of these broad powers, but it must be most obvious that these powers will have to be delegated to others, and from the statements that have already become a matter of public record it must be equally obvious that the standards and the formulas that will be used by others are open to grave and searching question. Our Secretary of State has on many occasions indicated one of the tests that he would apply in the exercise of such a policy. In discussing trade proposals, he has indicated that he would give much weight to certain tests that many of us would regard as questionable. In his proposal at the Seventh International Conference of American States at Montevideo the following statement is credited to Secretary Hull:

> They will endeavor in so doing to direct their greatest efforts toward the elimination of those duties and restrictions which completely or almost completely exclude international competition, such as those which restrict the importation of particular commodities to less than 3 to 5 percent of domestic consumption.

Last year, in response to a resolution approved by this body, the Tariff Commission prepared a list of articles of which imports represent less than 5 percent of domestic production—referred to in the statement of Secretary Hull which I just read. This list covers more than 100 pages in the document which they submitted in response to this resolution. It is not my purpose to burden you with a repetition of this list, but included in it are several hundred commodities in the chemical schedule; a large proportion of the commodities covered by the schedule relating to earths, earthenware, and glassware; commodities imported under almost every paragraph of schedule 3 concerned with metals and manufactures thereof; commodities imported in all but two of the paragraphs in the schedule relating to wood and manufactures thereof; even for the short schedules relating to sugar, molasses, and tobacco several commodities are included in this list. Included in this list of commodities are literally hundreds of products dutiable under the agricultural schedule, as well as countless more under the remaining dutiable schedules of the Tariff Act of 1930. Obviously, then, if we are to believe in the sincerity of our Secretary of State, the producers of any of these hundreds and hundreds of commodities are under suspicion. Unfortunately for them, it will be difficult to realize how such a test can be fairly applied in many cases, for in a competitive market it takes but a small quantity of imported goods to force the domestic price to a comparable level. In cases of this sort, which are most numerous, it is difficult for an industry to realize how seriously such a condition may be misinterpreted by individuals who have no intimate contact with the industry.

Naturally, I do not believe that the duties on all of these commodities will be reduced. But so far as this measure defines the powers of action, it is well within the possibility of future action that the individual producers of many of these commodities may some morning discover that the President has given his approval to negotiations, worked out by his assistants, reducing the tariff duties on some of these commodities. We will have to explain to these producers and manufacturers why we were willing to vote approval of a measure which because of its lack of a yardstick has left them in a position of false security. I cannot reconcile my thinking along these lines to support the delegation of such autocratic powers to a handful of men, who, even with the best of intentions, cannot be expected to have the intimate knowledge and background that is essential to anything approaching a judicial conclusion on such matters.

There should be no misunderstanding about my reference to the tabulation covering industries for which the imports represent less than 5 percent of domestic production. This is only one of many tests that might be applied in negotiating reciprocal tariff agreements.

I do not want to seem to carry this argument to an absurd and extreme position, but I cannot see how it is reasonable to expect that the producers of commodities in those lines of activity which are dependent for their existence upon tariff protection can go ahead with plans for the future which involve any capital commitments when they realize that we have delegated, without stipulation of the tests that are to be applied, the authority to reduce their tariff duties by 50 percent. I doubt very much if a producer of an agricultural commodity which is also produced in South and Latin America, or if a manufacturer turning out a product which is also manufactured in some European country, or engaged in a lumbering operation with the competing product in Canada, would be willing to enter into any very considerable long-term contract for capital goods if there were a prospect that on the morrow the manufacturer or producer should rise to find that the protection afforded his industry had been cut in half.

There is one other element involved in our consideration of this reciprocal trade program which follows logically from the preceding observations. In all the reorganization of our institutions that we have undertaken in the last 12 months, there has been a pronounced tendency for the Government to assume an obligation to indemnify those who are penalized as the result of the reorganization program. The most conspicuous phase of this policy is to be found in the operation of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. According to a tabulation introduced into the RECORD of April 18, the estimated obligations for 1934 for agricultural rental and benefit payments amounted to in excess of $724,000,000, in addition to which there was another eighty-five million for the removal of surplus products. The estimate for 1935 amounts to slightly more than $700,000,000 for these two divisions. In the words of Secretary Wallace, it is "in essense a program of governmental adjustment payments to cooperating farmers, rewarding a cooperative adjustment of acreage pro rata, farm by farm." I do not quarrel with this procedure, but I would point out that there is a gross inconsistency between a program which calls for the retirement from production of agricultural acreage and the indemnification therefor to a program which calls for the wiping out of certain of the producing units without enlisting their cooperation and without any semblance of concern with the question of compensating these units. A farmer may reduce his acreage, and if he retires the surplus thereof, he receives through the processing tax a benefit; but a man who suffers a 50 percent reduction in his tariff receives no compensating benefit, and both policies work to the same end.

We are asked under this reciprocal-tariff program to authorize the sacrifice of many such units, and we are told that the only way that this program may be effectively followed out is under a procedure which denies these units any of what have long been accepted as constitutional and moral obligations, and we are asked to approve of these sacrifices in advance under circumstances which would deprive all those associated with the units that are sacrificed of any compensation or redress. I cannot see how under the circumstances any one of us who regards his position here as a position of trust can give his approval to such a bill.

Mr. President, I have attempted in the latter part of the remarks which I have made to confine my observations to that portion of the tariff bill which the Senate Finance Committee thinks gives adequate notice to those who are to be affected by the lowering of tariff rates.

EXHIBIT A

STATEMENT OF FRED BRENCKMAN, WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE, NATIONAL GRANGE, BEFORE THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE, ON RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS, MAY 1, 1934

Everybody recognizes the good intentions of the administration in asking for the enactment of H.R. 8687, the bill which is before you. The declared purpose of this bill is to expand foreign markets for the products of the United States. Under present circumstances this purpose cannot be accomplished without admitting to the United States imports in exchange for our exports in connection with any reciprocal trade agreement which may be negotiated with any country under the terms outlined in the bill.

It is only too true that the figures representing our foreign trade have shrunk to pitiable proportions during recent years as compared with the impressive totals which prevailed for the years up to 1929. According to the Statistical Abstract of the United States, during the year 1929 our total exports, excluding those to Territories and possessions of the United States, amounted to $5,147,000,000, while our imports, with those from our Territories and possessions excluded, amounted to $4,251,000,000. By 1932 our exports had dropped to $1,562,000,000 and our imports were $1,229,000,000.

In considering the reduced volume of our foreign trade, it is, of course, necessary to take into consideration the fact that the whole world is now on a lower price level than it was in 1929. The decrease in actual tonnage, therefore, is not as great as the figures I have cited might indicate. It is likewise interesting to observe that the falling off of our imports has been in about the same proportion as between the free list and the dutiable list.

If it be contended that excessive rates in the present tariff act are responsible for the falling off in the volume of our foreign trade, why has the present administration not done anything to lower such rates under the flexible proviso? Only four changes in tariff rates have been made during the past year. Two of these changes were downward revisions and two were upward. The tariff on hay and manure forks was reduced from 8 cents each and 45 percent ad valorem to 4 cents each and 22½ percent ad valorem. Other agricultural forks, hoes, and rakes, and parts thereof were reduced from 30 percent to 15 percent ad valorem. The tariff on tuna fish packed in oil was increased from 30 percent to 45 percent, while the rate on certain other fish was increased from 30 percent to 44 percent ad valorem.

Since the surplus problem has been one of the most difficult with which agriculture has had to deal in recent years, it naturally follows that the farmers of the United States are eager to find an export market for their products, provided the home market is not sacrificed in bringing this about. However, we cannot overlook the fact that the home market is all important to American agriculture. The best market for American farm products and, in the case of many crops, the only market, is to be found in the United States.

One of the cardinal principles in the tariff policy of the National Grange reads as follows:

"So long as the American protective policy is maintained, we favor such rates of import duty as will insure the American market to the American farmer upon farm commodities which can be produced advantageously in any part of our country."

Among the objections to the pending bill are:

1. As it is now written, that feature of the measure which authorizes the President to proclaim modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions is so sweeping that it would be possible to bring cattle into this country having the foot-and-mouth disease. It would also make it possible to set aside the Lenroot-Taber Milk Act, providing that imported milk must conform to the same sanitary requirements as are in force domestically. That provision of the present revenue bill which imposes an excise tax upon certain imported oils could be voided, the antidumping laws could be suspended, and convict-made goods could be imported into the country under the present wording of the bill. "Import restrictions" enter into all these matters.

2. Our whole recovery program aims to raise the American price level above the world level. For the time being, at least, everybody seems to approve of that. Under the N.R.A. we have adopted the 40-hour week in industry; there is a possibility that before Congress adjourns legislation may be enacted making the 30-hour week mandatory in industry; and we have abolished child labor. Naturally all this increases our cost of production. It follows, therefore, that we must have proper protection, or American producers would speedily be deprived of their own market by a flood of imports from abroad. When I say proper protection, I do not mean the kind of protection that breeds monopoly, enriching the few at the expense of the many.

3. Everybody agrees that tariff tinkering unsettles business and creates uncertainties. That is true even when the tinkering is done in the open and everybody knows what is going on. The more secrecy there would be in negotiating reciprocal trade arrangements, the greater would be the uncertainty. It would seem that the bill should make provision for public hearings before agreements are consummated.

4. The bill provides that after a trade agreement has been negotiated, section 336 of the tariff act shall become inoperative so far as the commodity covered by any particular agreement is concerned. This means that regardless of how conditions might change, necessitating lowering or raising of tariff rates, it would be impossible to make any changes.

5. While the bill is to be in force for only 3 years, the prospects are, if it is passed, the people will never regain the power they now have to frame their own tariff laws.

6. Since the Presidency is a man-killing job, and the President cannot possibly give his personal attention to more than a small fraction of the matters already devolving upon him, he would necessarily have to delegate to others the functions of negotiating tariff treaties. This means that the power to make reciprocal trade agreements would largely be delegated to the Department of State or some other agency of the Government. The danger is that under these circumstances the needs and wants of our farmers might be subordinated to questions involving international relationships.

I have received a telegram from the Idaho State Grange expressing dissatisfaction with this bill. It reads as follows:

"Idaho Grange protests passage of the tariff bill without the right of public hearing. Star-chamber proceedings do not please us. We demand the right to protest. Please take this up with our Senators and register our Grange against such a bill."

The telegram is signed by Ray McKaig, chairman of the legislative committee of the Idaho State Grange, and by W. W. Deal, master. I also have a telegram from Ray W. Gill, master of the Oregon State Grange, who is against the bill. George Schlmeyer, master of the California State Grange, told me personally that he objects to the measure.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not desire to continue further this afternoon. I had to prepare hurriedly the remarks which I have made; other Senators will follow; and I am going now to ask the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], in view of the absence of some of the members of the Finance Committee, who are unable to be present today, if he will be willing at this time to have the tariff bill laid aside and to proceed with the Calendar or take a recess for the day?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not feel that that course can be consistently taken. This bill has been pending on the calendar now for a long time. It was reported on May 2, and some days ago I was asked to consent to an arrangement to refrain from taking up the bill until today, with the assurance that we might then proceed to its consideration and disposition. Under the circumstances, I am reluctant to consent to a delay, since every Senator has known for some time that the bill would be proceeded with today.

I cannot understand why those who are especially interested in the measure are not ready to present their views and such suggestions as they may desire to make with regard to the proposed legislation. I regret not to be able to respond to the request of the Senator from Oregon, but it occurs to me that we might proceed with the amendments to the bill, and at least dispose of them before considering a proposal to defer action.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course, the desire of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and of every Senator on this side is to reach a conclusion on the pending bill as soon as we can. I think that the final adjournment of Congress almost depends upon the conclusion reached in the consideration of this measure. Would the Senator from Oregon agree that at a certain time debate be limited upon the bill and on all amendments thereto, so that we may contemplate a certain time and thus expedite its passage?

Mr. McNARY. Of course, I would not agree to that. The measure has been only briefly and cursorily presented today, outside of the speech of the able Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. And outside the speech of the able Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. But I am not pleading for myself, and I want to assure the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Mississippi that I want to cooperate and not to cause delay. I think I have shown that to be my attitude during this entire session of the Congress. We want, however, full consideration, adequate presentation, and a thorough study of the problems involved in the pending measure. Unfortunately, three members of the Finance Committee, who had much of this matter in hand, are out of the city today. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is necessarily detained on account of personal matters, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] was called to New York, and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] was called to his home. I am willing to suggest the absence of a quorum and ascertain if any Senator is willing to go forward. If not, I then appeal with confidence to the Senator from Mississippi to permit the Senate to recess until tomorrow. In order to be exceedingly fair in the matter, I will now suggest the absence of a quorum and make a survey of the situation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is one phase of this matter that I am willing to go forward with and discuss.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested.

Mr. BORAH. I do not yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. McNARY. Very well, I withdraw the suggestion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H.J.Res. 345) to provide funds to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the purposes of the acts approved April 21, 1934, and April 7, 1934, relating, respectively, to cotton and to cattle and dairy products, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 16, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed, in the enrollment of the bill (S. 2845) entitled "An act to extend the provisions of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act to other stolen property", to strike out "1929" where it appears in section 7 thereof and insert in lieu thereof "1919."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 258. An act for the relief of Wallace E. Ordway;

S. 1982. An act to add certain lands to the Mount Hood National Forest in the State of Oregon;

S. 2080. An act to provide punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers;

S. 2249. An act applying the powers of the Federal Government, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to extortion by means of telephone, telegraph, radio, oral message, or otherwise;

S. 2252. An act to amend the act forbidding the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce;

S. 2253. An act making it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution in certain cases;

S. 2575. An act to define certain crimes against the United States in connection with the administration of Federal, penal, and correctional institutions and to fix the punishment therefor;

S. 2841. An act to provide punishment for certain offenses committed against banks organized or operating under laws of the United States or any member of the Federal Reserve System;

S. 3364. An act for the relief of G. T. Fleming;

H.R. 211. An act for the relief of John A. Rapelye;

H.R. 276. An act to authorize the placing of a bronze tablet bearing a replica of the Congressional Medal of Honor upon the grave of the late Brig. Gen. Robert H. Dunlap, United States Marine Corps, in the Arlington National Cemetery, Va.;

H.R. 328. An act for the relief of E. W. Gillespie;

H.R. 473. An act for the relief of Irene Brand Alper;

H.R. 916. An act for the relief of C. A. Dickson;

H.R. 1197. An act for the relief of Glenna F. Kelley;

H.R. 1211. An act for the relief of R. Gilbertsen;

H.R. 1212. An act for the relief of Marie Toenberg;

H.R. 4516. An act for the relief of B. Edward Westwood;

H.R. 4533. An act for the relief of the widow of D. W. Tanner for expense of purchasing an artificial limb;

H.R. 4973. An act for the relief of G. C. Vandover;

H.R. 5284. An act for the relief of the Playa de Flor Land & Improvement Co.;

H.R. 5405. An act for the relief of Nicola Valerio; and

H.R. 5950. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bill and joint resolution were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H.R. 8700. An act to establish a Code of Laws for the Canal Zone, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

H.J.Res. 345. Joint resolution to provide funds to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the purposes of the acts approved April 21, 1934, and April 7, 1934, relating, respectively, to cotton and to cattle and dairy products, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives relative to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 8617) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, which was read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 24, 1934.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 17, and 30 to the bill (H.R. 8617) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of the sum proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert "$443,610."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of the sum proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert "$212,772."

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 15 to said bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 12 and 16 to the bill, further insist on the Senate amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 15, and request a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments still in disagreement.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. COOLIDGE, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is probable that the constitutional question which I believe to be presented by this measure will not be the determining factor in the disposition of the measure. It may be that a majority of the Senate will conclude that economic reasons should be controlling. However that may be, I am not willing—in fact, I am quite unwilling—that the RECORD shall be silent as to the constitutional problem involved. I look upon it as controlling. There are other reasons why I could not support the measure. But the constitutional question transcends all others in importance.

It seems to me the bill runs counter to the plain provisions of the Constitution. I therefore beg the indulgence of my colleagues while I discuss the bill in the light of these constitutional provisions.

There is no subject in which the people have or could have a greater interest than that of where the taxing power of government should rest and how and under what circumstances it may be exercised. The subject of taxation and where the taxing power should rest has always been an important question and sometimes a burning theme throughout the story of Anglo-Saxon civilization. Civil strife has sometimes ensued in the settlement of this problem, and dynasties have fallen and kings have been beheaded.

These things were fresh in the minds of the builders of our Government. They left nothing in doubt on this subject. The plain provisions of the Constitution place this power where it had been placed through centuries of strife and bloodshed, to wit, with the Parliaments or in the Congress. That is where it should remain in all its fullness, in all its integrity, in no wise to be compromised or surrendered.

Much has been said in popular discussion, and something was said this morning upon the floor with reference to the fact that an emergency exists and that this measure is to meet an emergency. I do not controvert the fact that an economic emergency exists and may exist for some time to come, but I do contend that, so far as the constitutional question is concerned, we may put aside the suggestion as to an emergency. If the Congress has power under the Constitution to pass this kind of a measure, then there may be an emergency justifying its passage; but the existence of an emergency throws no light whatever upon the constitutional question; an emergency, in other words, does not add to or take from the power of Congress under the Constitution.

There has grown up in recent years, both from popular discussion and even from language used by the courts, a view to the effect that an emergency has an expanding power, as it were, upon the Constitution of the United States. An emergency adds nothing to and takes nothing from the Constitution. It is the same at all times and under all circumstances, except as it may be changed by the people in the manner pointed out in the Constitution itself. We ought to eliminate that question before we proceed to discuss the constitutional question. I think it is disposed of by the Supreme Court in one of its latest decisions, where it said:

> Emergency does not create power. Emergency does not increase granted power or remove or diminish the restrictions imposed upon power granted or reserved. The Constitution was adopted in a period of grave emergency. Its grants of power to the Federal Government and its limitations of the power of the States were determined in the light of emergency, and they are not altered by emergency. What power was thus granted and what limitations were thus imposed are questions which have always been, and always will be, the subject of close examination under our constitutional system.
> While emergency does not create power, emergency may furnish the occasion for the exercise of power. Although an emergency may not call into life a power which has never lived, nevertheless, emergency may afford a reason for the exertion of a living power already enjoyed. The constitutional question presented in the light of an emergency is whether the power possessed embraces the particular exercise of it in response to particular conditions. Thus the war power of the Federal Government is not created by the emergency of war but it is a power given to meet that emergency. It is a power to wage war successfully, and thus it permits the harnessing of the entire energies of the people in a supreme cooperative effort to preserve the Nation. But even the war power does not remove constitutional limitations in safeguarding essential liberties. When the provisions of the Constitution, in grant or restriction, are specific, so particularized as not to admit of construction, no question is presented.

In other words, as I understand the Supreme Court, an emergency can do nothing more than to call into exercise some power found in the Constitution but which may not hitherto have been exercised. But the power must be found in the Constitution. So plain and self-evident a principle of constitutional law would not need to be stated were it not for the loose language and confused thought so often found in discussions at this time on this subject.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. But in the Minnesota case the Supreme Court called into exercise a specific prohibition of the Constitution against the right to impair the obligation of contracts.

Mr. BORAH. I would not undertake to defend the Minnesota case. Great as is the respect I have for that high tribunal, I am unable to agree with its decision in that case. The Senator will be interested to know I was reading from the Minnesota case with reference to emergency power.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I knew that, and I should be more interested to have the Senator read the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Sutherland.

Mr. BORAH. The dissenting opinion confirms the position which I am taking today. I also find ample support of the position which I am taking in the majority opinion until the Court reaches the point where it decides the case. I have difficulty in following the application of the principle by which the Court reached its conclusions.

Mr. GLASS. In other words, the Supreme Court argues against the right to exercise the power which it ultimately exercises.

Mr. BORAH. As was said by the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a few days ago, it is difficult to know just how the Court reconciled the declaration that an emergency gives no power with the declaration at the conclusion of the opinion. But that difficulty is one which I am not going to undertake to adjust today. I do not think I shall ever assume that task.

Mr. President, may we not properly enter upon the discussion of this matter, so far as the constitutional question is concerned, precisely as if no emergency existed? There may be an economic emergency, there may be a reason for trying to build up international trade—and I think there is—but the question of whether we have the power to do what is provided for in the pending bill must be determined wholly free from the question of any economic emergency.

There has been a supposition undoubtedly entertained by many people that an emergency, somewhat like the midnight hags upon the blasted heath tormenting the soul of Macbeth, can call up power from the unknown deep of the Constitution that is desired for any particular occasion. But we must come back to the undoubted fundamental principle that when we are searching for constitutional power an emergency has absolutely nothing to do with the question of whether the power exists.

Mr. President, if that be a correct principle—and I think it is from the decisions of the Court itself—what are the provisions of the Constitution which we ought to consider in connection with the bill? First, let us consider the treaty-making power. "He", the President, "shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

I ask, What is the agreement which is to be finally executed or agreed upon between two sovereign Nations, the United States and France, or the United States and Great Britain, or the United States and Germany? Is it not under all definitions a treaty? The Supreme Court has said that a treaty is a compact between sovereign powers. If this agreement is made, it binds the United States. It binds every citizen of the United States. It is the law of the land. It meets every essential and every attribute that appertains to a treaty.

If the President were making an agreement with an industry in Germany or in Italy, with individuals who were engaged in shipping goods into this country, that would be an Executive agreement; but when he makes an agreement with France to control her imports into this country, under all tests of what constitutes a treaty, that becomes a treaty. It is binding upon France, binding upon the United States, binding upon all the citizens of the United States, and is the law of the United States. Any citizen violating it would be subject to punishment under the general statutes of the United States appertaining to the violation of treaties the same as if he violated a treaty between this country and Cuba with reference to sugar. There is no essential element of the agreement here to be made which would not be found if it were called a treaty or an agreement.

In my opinion, we are squarely presented with the question of whether we can authorize the President of the United States to make an agreement or a treaty between this country and Great Britain. Can we delegate the power to make a treaty? What else have we to delegate on the subject? Can we delegate the power to enter into a compact with France without the ratification of the Senate? Yet that is precisely what is proposed. Can we by calling it an agreement, but give it all the attributes, qualities, and conditions of a treaty, escape this provision of the Constitution? Looking through terms to the substance of the thing to be negotiated, it is a treaty. If it is not a treaty, no industry would be found to observe it should it conflict with its interest. But it is to have all the force, binding effect, and dignity of a treaty, for it is to bind governments and citizens alike.

The able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] said today the Kasson Treaties were rejected. Therefore he argued it is necessary to permit that to be done which the Kasson treaties did do in order that we make speed, in order that we may know what we desire to do will be accomplished. In other words, the very argument in support of the proposition presented by those who are supporting it concedes that it is a binding compact between those nations and the United States.

Secondly, article 1, section 8, clause 1, of the Constitution provides that "the Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." I do not believe it will be seriously contended that the laying of a duty or the increasing of a duty or the lowering of a duty is not dealing with the tax question. I have always felt and I have always contended that when we enact a tariff law we are taxing the people of the United States; we are imposing a tax. It may be that it is in interest of the Nation as a whole, taking into consideration wages, standard of living, and so forth, that it is wise to impose the duty, but it is a tax.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. How does the Senator reconcile the view he is now expressing with the decision in Field against Clark, wherein, in construing one of the sections of the McKinley Act where the agreement did not come back to Congress, the court upheld the constitutionality of the act?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will permit me, I have that on my desk to discuss a little later.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. I cannot escape the belief that we are dealing with the tax question when we are making tariffs. I remember that the able gentleman who regularly presides over this body—a straight thinker and a straight talker—declared, when the flexible tariff bill was before the House of Representatives, that it unquestionably delegated the taxing power. I agreed with him then. I cannot escape that conviction now. We are giving the Executive the power to increase or decrease any duties which may now be found in the law of the United States. He may impose a higher duty; he may reduce a duty; but he is all the time dealing with the taxing power—a power which was given exclusively to the Congress of the United States.

The fathers were so careful with reference to the taxing power that they provided that all tax bills should originate in the House whose Members the people have an opportunity to select every 2 years. The fathers not only provided that the taxing power should belong to the Congress, but they were careful to provide that tax measures should originate only in the body which most often responds to the people of the United States; and that was in exact accord with the history of taxation from the time of John Hampden down to the adoption of our Constitution. One king had lost his head, and one had lost his crown, by trying to take away from the parliament, from the law-making body, those who represented directly the people, any part or parcel of the taxing power.

So it was not a mere question of judgment as to how the Constitution should operate in the future. The fathers knew what the history of the past was, and they desired to incorporate in the Constitution a provision which would always hold the taxing power with the House of Representatives.

I pause long enough to say that I trust those who hear me will understand that no part of the view I am expressing has anything to do with any doubt on my part of the ability or the high purpose of the President of the United States. The view which I now express I urged as strongly as I could when the flexible tariff was before the Senate of the United States. In other words, I hold the settled conviction, formed after the best possible study I could bring to the subject through years of experience, that the taxing power in its integrity and its fullness should belong to those who are directly responsible in the different districts of the United States where the people can ask for a hearing and be heard at almost any time they choose.

Again, the Constitution provides:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States.

Is not the making of a tariff a legislative power? Has it not been so since the hour when the Constitution was framed? Has there ever been a time when we did not regard the fact of establishing a rate as the exercise of discretion, the exercise of judgment, the selection of facts, all of which constitute the exercise of legislative power? Yet here we are proposing to leave to the Executive entire discretion, entire judgment to select his own facts, to discard what facts he desires, to pass upon the matter exactly as you and I would pass upon it if we were passing a measure here.

The taxing power, the treaty-making power, the legislative power, are all involved in this bill.

There is still another provision which seems to me equally involved, and that is that the Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

The able speech of the Senator from Mississippi today was addressed to the proposition of increasing or decreasing or regulating commerce with foreign nations. The very object and purpose of this bill is to impress upon international commerce our will, our desire, if it is possible to do so; either to increase it, decrease it, augment it, or diminish it. That is the supreme purpose of the measure—first, to make a treaty; second, to lay a tax; third, to regulate commerce.

Mr. President, may I ask: Why is this bill here? Why is this measure before Congress asking for power? If the President had the power, of course, it would not be here. He comes here and asks for power. What is the power for which he asks? He could not ask for something which we do not have. He can only ask for something we do have. All in the world we have to give him is either treaty-making power or legislative power, because that is all we possess on this subject.

If this were a mere Executive agreement, the President could make it without the consent of Congress; but when he reaches beyond that and makes a treaty he must come to Congress and ask for power. What does he ask for? He asks for power which we have, and that is the treaty-making power. We cannot part with something we have not, and we cannot give him something we have not. We can only give him the treaty-making power or the legislative power. They are the only two powers we have to grant. He would not be here asking for this power if it were not necessary for him to have something that we possess as a legislative body. He would not be here asking for the power to fix tariff rates if he had any power to do it without our action, and the very fact that he asks for the power is conclusive proof that it must be legislative power, because we are a legislative body, and have nothing to confer except legislative or treaty-making power.

Mr. President, the able Senator from Mississippi referred today to certain precedents which I now desire to examine. Let us take the one which he mentioned a moment ago—the act of 1890—which was construed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Field against Clark, in One Hundred and Forty-third United States Reports.

What was the act which the Court construed, and upon what principle did it base its decision? I not only contend that that decision does not support this bill, but I shall earnestly contend that it is in direct conflict with the terms of this bill, for the reason that the decision was based upon a principle which the Court said was necessary for the validity of the measure then under review, which principle is not found in this bill.

The act of 1890 provided for the free introduction into the United States of certain articles, such as sugar, coffee, tea, and so forth. The act itself provided that they should come in free. It further provided that if the President should ascertain that the countries exporting those articles were laying duties upon our products which were nonreciprocal, he should do what? Make different tariff rates, as provided in this bill? Certainly not. He should have power by proclamation to suspend the free clause, and the Congress itself provided the duties which should be imposed when that suspension took place.

The law was complete within itself. It provided, first, for free trade on these subjects; secondly, it provided for the duties which should obtain in case the President ascertained a certain fact and issued a proclamation. It was upon that principle that the Supreme Court based its opinion.

It will be seen that under the act of 1890 the President was to fix no rates. He was not given power to fix rates of any kind. The law provided that certain provisions of it were to be suspended when the President should ascertain that the countries from which these articles came had imposed nonreciprocal duties. Upon his ascertaining the fact that certain duties had been imposed by foreign countries, the Congress authorized him to issue a proclamation.

Let us now read from the decision to which I have been referring. I read from page 692 of One Hundred and Forty-third United States Reports:

> That the Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular under consideration, is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles, should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them, that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States, which the President deemed, that is, which he found to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable. Congress itself prescribed, in advance, the duties to be levied, collected, and paid, on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, produced by or exported from such designated country, while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President.

I venture to say that the whole question of expediency here is left to the President. The question as to whether he shall make a particular agreement covering particular duties, establishing a particular rate, is wholly and completely within his discretion. He may fix the rates. Here he could not.

Again I read from the decision:

> As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it cannot be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws.
> Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the lawmaking department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries shall be suspended in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties shall be imposed.

The whole question of the rate-making power, of establishing duties, of fixing rates, was retained by Congress, and the Supreme Court held that, in view of the fact that the Congress had fixed the rates, that completed the law and left to the President the ascertainment of a fact in the proclamation issued, but that that of itself did not constitute legislation.

Is there anything of that kind in this measure? As I read the bill, the President is authorized, first, to enter into foreign-trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof. There is no limitation.

> (2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements.

Whatever rate he fixes is the rate which, in his discretion, he thinks ought to be fixed.

In this decision the court left nothing to the President as a discretion with reference to rates.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator if he does not want to be interrupted, but I have a question I should like to ask.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to finish first, and then I will answer any question.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. Let me say, in passing, that there is no place to be found in any of the tariff legislation which I have been able to investigate where the President has ever been given power to fix tariff rates through agreements with foreign nations.

We come now to the act of 1922, which was construed by the Supreme Court of the United States in a case reported in Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports, page 394. I should premise what I have to say in regard to that decision by the statement that I cannot reconcile my view of constitutional law with the decision. I may discuss that a little later, though it is not really pertinent.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the Hampton case, is it?

Mr. BORAH. That is the Hampton case. In that decision the court still stressed the fact that there must be a rule announced by the Congress to govern the President in fixing rates. It cannot be considered as a decision in support of this measure, however much I or others may disagree with the decision itself.

The pertinent question is, does it sustain the bill now before the Senate? Let us see what the Supreme Court said on that question. I read beginning with page 407 in Two Hundred and Seventy-sixth United States Reports. Said the Supreme Court:

> "The true distinction, therefore, is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made." (See also Moers v. Reading, 21 Penn. St. 188, 202; Locke's Appeal, 72 Penn. St. 491, 498.)
> Again, one of the great functions conferred on Congress by the Federal Constitution is the regulation of interstate commerce and rates to be exacted by interstate carriers for the passenger and merchandise traffic. * * *
> It is conceded by counsel that Congress may use executive officers in the application and enforcement of a policy declared in law by Congress, and authorize such officers in the application of the congressional declaration to enforce it by regulation equivalent to law. But it is said that this never has been permitted to be done where Congress has exercised the power to levy taxes and fix customs duties. The authorities make no such distinction. The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce, by declarirng the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates, and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with its provisions the fixing of such rates, justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise. If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden declaration of legislative power.

The Court then cites the case of Field against Clark. If the Congress shall lay down an intelligible principle to guide or control the Executive in fixing the rates, then, says this decision, the delegation of power does not apply.

Where is the rule? What principle—what rule is provided for in the bill to which the President must adhere in fixing these rates? When he enters into one of these treaties, must the rates be in accord with the theory of cost of production at home and abroad? The bill does not say so. Must it be in accord with some other rule? The bill does not say so. These rates may be in accord with any principle which the President chooses to accept. And therein is the fatal defect of this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. We thought we had fixed the rule in order to come under that decision. On page 2 of the bill the Senator will see, in line 10, after giving the background, that the bill provides:

The President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States—

The Senator will note that in the bill as it passed the House they had the word "or." We have strengthened it by changing the "or" to "and"—

and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified.

Of course, "the purpose above declared" is the purpose set out. We thought we had fixed the rule.

Mr. BORAH. It is my opinion that the fixing took place in the wrong place in the bill. The Senator fixed the condition upon which the President could assume to exercise the power, but no rule is given by which the President would be controlled in the exercise of the power, and that is the test. The committee laid down no rule in this measure which would control the President in any way whatever in fixing tariff rates between this country and other countries.

It is true that it is said that if the President finds as a fact that interstate commerce is burdened, he may act. How act? At his own discretion, at his own will, according to his own judgment. There is no rule whatever to guide him. So I say that while the Senator has carefully brought himself within the decision of the Supreme Court where he would authorize the President to suspend a rate, the Senator was dealing with Field against Clark, where the President was given no power whatever to make rates. They said that if he found as a fact that the tariff rates were nonreciprocal, he could do what? Not fix rates, as is provided in this bill, but that he could suspend rates which the Congress had fixed, and then such rates as the Congress had fixed would go into effect.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the committee has brought itself at all within the provisions of either the Clark case or the Hampton case, and God knows the Hampton case is bad enough. I think the opinion delivered in the Hampton case certainly goes as far as anyone could want to go if we are to have any constitution at all.

It is said in that case that if Congress lays down an intelligible principle, so-and-so shall be done. An intelligible principle? Suppose Congress should pass a law providing that we desired to have all tariff rates fixed upon the principle of a tariff for revenue only. That would be an intelligible principle, would it not?

Yet under this decision the President could fix all tariff rates after that rule was laid down. Certainly it is not desired to go further than that. And in this case it does go further, because it leaves no rule of principle whatever to guide the President in fixing the rate.

Mr. President, the old case which passed upon the embargo laws has been referred to. That is a case which I think was decided in 1813. I do not believe that it can have any real relevancy to this bill for this reason. In 1809, as I recall, Congress passed an act declaring an embargo against all goods coming from France or England. That act was passed because of the fact that both France and England had engaged in what were called nonneutral or unneutral acts. They had issued edicts and orders in council which affected trade with the United States. It was Mr. Jefferson's idea, followed by his successor, that the way to deal with that subject was to have no trade with them whatever. So Congress passed a law prohibiting all importations from those countries.

That law served out its time; but in 1810—I believe the year was, but I will not be sure as to dates—Congress reenacted the law, that is, simply passed a provision to the effect that it be extended to a certain time—and it was provided in the law that if the President ascertained the fact that either France or England had canceled its nonneutral acts, he should suspend the law and trade should go on as before. But he had nothing to do with fixing and controlling trade. He was simply authorized, upon ascertaining the fact that the orders in council had been revoked, or the edict of Nantes had been revoked, that the law which had been passed should be suspended. The case of Field against Clark came within that case.

I do not find, Mr. President, any decision of the court, which seems to me, speaking with great respect for those who framed this bill to come either within Field against Clark or the Hampton case. I can find no rule, no principle, in this bill controlling or guiding the President in what rates he shall fix.

In the Hampton case Congress undertook to say that the rule should be the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. That is not the rule here. It is not in this bill. There is no rule here. Of course he would not, but he might say that "I will give them advantage on the question of the cost of production abroad."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As an initial proposition, before the decision in the flexible-tariff case, I think that doubt might have arisen in anyone's mind as to whether this bill constituted a delegation of legislative authority; but I point out now that the rule for the guidance of the agent of Congress, the Chief Executive, in the revision of rates or changes of rates which he was empowered to make was no more definite in that case than it is in this case. The pending bill provides that—

Whenever he—

finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified—

He—is authorized from time to time—

And so forth.

That is the rule, as I understand it, laid down in this proposed statute, and it seems to me quite as definite as the rule laid down in the flexible-tariff case. The President is required to find certain facts; and when those facts are found, he is given the same power that was granted in the flexible-tariff case. It is true that this is not the identical rule that was employed in the flexible-tariff statute of 1922; but, in my judgment, it is also true that the rule in this case conforms to the precedents in that it defines what the President must do—the administrative acts that he must perform.

It is admitted, of course, that the power to make laws, the legislative power, cannot be granted to the Executive or to any other agent that the Congress might choose, but, in my view, this is not a delegation of legislative power. The President is not given authority to pass any law. He is merely required to perform certain administrative functions in conformity to a rule laid down by the Congress.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas that the rule laid down in the Hampton case is very indefinite. I think it was a clear grant of legislative power. I think it so strongly that I do not desire to express any candid opinion of the case. But I differ with the Senator from Arkansas, however, upon the proposition as to the rule being announced in this bill with reference to fixing rates. While it is true that the rule passed upon in the Hampton case was a most general rule, yet it was a rule which had reference to the fixing of rates. It was a rule which said that the President should establish rates in accordance with the principle of cost of production at home and abroad. Certainly that is a broad rule, but it did have some reference to the fixing of rates. It did not have reference to calling into power the action of the President. It had reference to controlling his power when it was exercised.

In the Hampton case the section reads:

SEC. 315 (a). That in order to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States, and to put into force and effect the policy of the Congress by this act intended, whenever the President, upon investigation of the differences in costs of production of articles wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States, and of like or similar articles wholly or in part the growth or product of competing foreign countries, shall find it thereby shown that the duties fixed in this act do not equalize the said differences in costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country he shall, by such investigation, ascertain said differences and determine and proclaim the changes in classifications or increases or decreases in any rate of duty provided in this act—

And so forth. In other words, the President was to ascertain, in order to fix his rate, the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. He had an obligation circumscribed and controlled in the fixing of the amount of the rates. And upon that the Supreme Court based its decision. It seems to me that this bill does not at all undertake to control the President as to the amount of the rate, or as to what rule, whether the cost of production at home or abroad, or another, should obtain.

Mr. President, I conclude my remarks by reading from an old case of which I am very fond. It is the case of Ex Parte Milligan, found in 4 Wall. It arose out of the conditions which presented the most searching and awful emergency the country has ever known, and I pray that it may ever know. An emergency which involved the life of this blessed old Republic. It says:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it, which are necessary to preserve its existence.

Mr. President, the people and the people alone may change the Constitution. Emergencies cannot do so. The terms and provisions of the Constitution—the very genius of the instrument itself can leave no one in doubt that it was made to deal with great national emergencies. Under it there is no want of power, no want of authority to enable a nation to meet and master all emergencies.

The Constitution was not the handiwork of men unschooled in practical affairs, of theorists and dreamers. It was written by men who all their lives had been compelled to look upon, to contend with, emergencies. It was framed at a time when the whole world was in turmoil and strife, when our own Colonies were contending with all those problems which spring from disordered finance, from overwhelming debts, from the absence of credit, and the complete breakdown of trade and commerce. A great and overwhelming emergency hovered about and threatened to engulf the whole vast adventure of free government in utter and everlasting ruin, even at the very hour these immortal lawgivers gathered for the purpose of planning a new scheme of government and framing a national charter. This Constitution is the child of one of the great emergencies of all times.

I know it will be said that this delegation of power is for a limited time and is given to one in whom the people have great confidence. But the precedent which Franklin D. Roosevelt establishes will be claimed and enlarged upon by all his successors, whoever they may be. Precedents established by competent hands for desirable purposes are still precedents for incapable hands and undesirable purposes. Let us see how precedents grow. Mr. Hoover asked power to change tariff rates. It was a vicious power. In my opinion, it ought never to have been given. But under the plea of service to the people and under the plea of party loyalty, it was given. Franklin D. Roosevelt succeeds Mr. Hoover and, using that precedent as a stepping stone, goes an arrow's flight beyond his predecessor. If I were going to search the realm of possibilities for the most subtle, the most insidious, the most persistent, and most insatiable foe of constitutional government, I would say that that enemy is to be found in precedents established outside the Constitution in the name of the people and under the party lash. A precedent once thus established, no one can know its ultimate use or effect. A child may play across the Mississippi at its source, but as it flows on, gathering strength, it may inundate territory, submerge farms, destroy property and life, and divide a continent.

Mr. President, the integrity of constitutional government has never meant so much to the average man and woman, to the common people, as Abraham Lincoln was wont to say, as it does at this hour. Nowhere on the round globe today do the common people enjoy the blessings of personal freedom except under constitutional democracy—there, and there alone, are to be found a free press, free speech, personal liberty, and all those priceless blessings which distinguish the citizens of a free country from the hunted, helpless, managed individuals who make up the cogs in the soulless machine of some absolute state. Fascism, nazi-ism, communism, appealing to the forces of terror and fanaticism, have submerged, buried, the individual beneath the schemes of personal aggrandizement. They have challenged democracy, and they have challenged democracy because democracy stands for free speech and personal liberty. Neither fascism, nazi-ism, nor communism as a form of government could exist for a fortnight in the pure atmosphere of intellectual freedom. These governments rest upon the political serfdom of the masses. They depend for perpetuity upon the economic and political enslavement of the people. They begin and they continue so long as they continue by putting chains upon the limbs and fetters upon the brain.

Constitutional democracy is the only scheme of government which preserves, or pretends to preserve, the rights, the liberties of the average man and woman; it is the only government which makes personal liberty the keystone of the arch, which rests its right to live upon the loyalty and love of its supporters.

Mr. President, let us not be deceived. All these forms of government which disregard the rights and liberties of the individual and emphasize the dictatorship and omnipotence of the state are but throw-backs to the days when the great body of the people were regarded as the mudsills of society—when the humble citizen was fit only to work and slave and fight and die for the glory of the king. There is not a principle, not a tenet, not a doctrine of fascism or nazi-ism which may not be found in the brutal creeds of every tyrant who has robbed the people of their liberties from the dawn of history down to the miserable representatives of despotic power who disappeared in the smoke and flames of the World War. They are all of the same creed, of the same faith, the same beliefs. They hate personal liberty. They are conspirators against the most sacred rights of the citizen. The voice of fascism has lately declared that "liberty is a rotten carcass." So it has always been a rotten carcass from the beginning with all those who deride, decry, and denounce democracy. These governments are not going forward; they are going back—back to serfdom and slavery, back to intolerance and tribalism, back a thousand years, when the people were lashed into submission by the iron discipline of a dictator.

But the disturbing fact is that in the face of this almost universal assault upon personal liberty, upon free government, democracy seems timid, apologetic, distrustful of its own powerful weapons of defense and its still more powerful weapons of advancement. An emergency seems to arise, and we immediately give evidence of a want of faith in our own institutions and in the instrumentalities provided by the Constitution. We seem to doubt the methods and means provided by the founders of democracy.

We have an emergency, and we immediately appeal to measures which cast a doubt upon our faith in our own institutions. We have an emergency, and we employ instrumentalities to discredit our faith in democratic institutions.

We need something of the ancient faith, something of the ancient vision. You will remember, Mr. President, in the history of the American Revolution when the British forces were in possession of the Old Dominion, when the traitor Benedict Arnold was leading his marauding forces up and down the coast, when Tarleton was burning the homes and villages, when Mr. Nicholas, a distinguished citizen of Virginia, seconded by Patrick Henry, moved that a dictator be appointed for the Commonwealth. Thomas Jefferson was then Governor of Virginia. He had just narrowly escaped capture at the hands of the British forces. When this resolution came to his attention, he said:

The very thought alone was treason against mankind in general, as riveting forever the chains which bow down their necks by giving their oppressors proof—

Do not forget that—

by giving their oppressors proof, which they would have trumpeted throughout the universe, of the imbecility of republican government in times of pressing danger to shield us from harm.

What vision! What trust! What confidence!

Of these things this Republic was built, and of these things alone it will be maintained.

We have had emergencies in the past. We have had more than one hour of peril. The Constitution has been sufficient and efficient in all instances. And now, of all times, we should show our faith in, and our devotion to, our form of government. Now, more than at any other time in our history, we should by word and act demonstrate the faith which made this Republic, and which will preserve it.

In the midst of world turmoil Washington pinned his faith to constitutional democracy. That steadfast soul never wavered, never doubted. In the midst of the fiercest hour of civil war Lincoln declared that the government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall not perish from the earth. There is a niche alongside of these two immortal defenders of free government for the brave American who in his place of power accepts the challenge of these apostles of terror and fanaticism, of these enemies, avowed enemies of free government and of personal liberty, and against all comers declares his faith in the efficiency and the worth of republican institutions and his determination to maintain and preserve them in all their integrity at any cost and at all hazards.

WAR CLAIMS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BONE in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 325) extending for 2 years the time within which American claimants may make application for payment, under the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission and the Tripartite Claims Commission, and extending until March 10, 1936, the time within which Hungarian claimants may make application for payment, under the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, of awards of the War Claims Arbiter, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. KING, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. WALSH, Mr. REED, and Mr. COUZENS conferees on the part of the Senate.

LAURA GOLDWATER

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4253) for the relief of Laura Goldwater, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. BAILEY, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I probably am regarded, as I have been denominated by the papers recently, as a tariff Democrat. I am, however, no more a tariff Democrat than the others who sit on this side of the Chamber, with few exceptions. I have stood for a tariff when it affected commodities produced in my own State and in which my State was interested, except that I have been a little bit broader, realizing that I had to be reciprocal and vote for a tariff on the other man's products in order that we might have one on ours. That has been my practical understanding. I have not been one of those who defended the virtue of his own tariff and decried the virtue of the other fellow's tariff.

However, I have opposed the abdication of the functions of Congress. I shall soon be able to say that I have no further mission to perform in this body, along with my colleagues. My friend, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], has been the only one beside myself that I have heard state on the floor that the purposes for which Congress was created are nearly entirely vanished. I know of no rule of law—and if there is one, with my limited knowledge of the law I should like to have it explained from a better source of knowledge if I am not correct—I know of no rule of law, if this is a piece of constitutional legislation, that would prevent us from giving the President of the United States the power to declare war.

If it is possible for us to empower the President to say that he finds there is an undue burden upon foreign commerce and that if he so finds he has the power to levy such a tariff as he wants to levy—and that is what the bill provides—and fix such tax as he wants to fix; if that is constitutional government, then we can just as easily write a law saying, or providing in this bill, that if the President finds in his own opinion that there is such a condition as indicates national peril threatening, he shall have the right to declare war and appropriate the moneys to carry on the war.

I call upon any constitutional lawyer who has ever been in this body to tell me why, if one is correct, the other is not correct. Is there power in the Congress to abdicate? To say we have not abdicated would be folly. No man, unless he be a Member of Congress, will say we have not been abdicating for the last year and a half; but no man here, I am sure, will say that the Congress has not the power to go on now and wind up its business and its duties and adjourn, simply by adding one more clause to the bill now before the Senate providing that if there is any such thing as national peril to the United States, the President of the United States shall have the right and power to declare war and to levy taxes for the purpose of carrying on the war. In fact, if there are those who yet persist in the belief that an emergency varies the terms of the Constitution, I am sure it would be more valid to empower the President to declare war than it is to empower him to fix revenues under this kind of a reciprocal arrangement in which is involved the treaty-making power and the legislative power as well.

Let me see what has been done since I have been in Congress in the way of granting power to the President of the United States. We have made the bold experiment of doing away with legislative government. Any Senator may say that we have not, but I insist that we have. We have made the test as to whether or not we need a Congress.

We have decided; whether constitutionally or not, nevertheless it has been done; and we have ventured upon the bold experiment of doing away with the Congress of the United States. Where did we start that plan? We started it when we vested the power in the President of the United States, first, complete authority over the coinage of money and the regulating of the value of money.

We started it, secondly, when we gave the President the right to do that which was denied by the constitutional lawyers of the Senate as being within the sole right of the legislative branch itself—the power to fix the hours and pay of labor. That was another divestment of the constitutional prerogatives belonging to the legislative body.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is the Senator in his second specification referring to the N.R.A. bill?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Did the Senator vote for that bill or not?

Mr. LONG. I voted to strike out the N.R.A. provision.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator voted for the bill on its final passage, changing his vote at the end of the roll call.

Mr. LONG. Yes. The bill was a monstrosity; one of the worst that was ever brought before the Senate. Title 1 was the N.R.A. Title 2 dealt with Public Works. Title 3, I believe, provided for the carrying out of the Public Works title. I have forgotten exactly what title 3 did provide. However, I voted to strike out title 1 of the bill. I was in favor of the other two titles. I made my position clearly known on the floor of the Senate. The only vote I could cast in favor of Public Works and against the N.R.A. was such vote as I did cast.

Mr. CLARK. But the Senator did vote for the bill on its final passage?

Mr. LONG. I voted for the passage of the two titles after having voted to strike out title 1 and making my position very clear on the floor of the Senate, and speaking some few minutes in explanation of my position.

I have mentioned three of the functions we have abdictated. We went further. We decided to place in the control of the bureaus of the Government a power which constitutional lawyers have denied existed in the Congress itself, and that was the power to regulate the production of agricultural products and to fix the value of them, as well as to provide for their destruction. We abdictated that function.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is the Senator referring to the A.A.A. bill in that specification?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Did the Senator vote for that bill?

Mr. LONG. I voted for the A.A.A. bill. After expressing my opposition to it, I voted for it. I stated that if the President of the United States would put in it a provision for the expansion of the currency of the country, I would vote for it—voting for it because it was the only legislation we were permitted to vote for at the time, knowing at the time and stating at the time that it was a departure from the better and safer principles which we had been following and which we should continue to follow. No one here has been undertaking to deal with an emergency by pursuing a standard constitutional route. Those of us who have proposed such a course have been voted down. We have been faced with one alternative after the other, having to vote for bills containing 3 or 4, or even 8 or 10 titles, one dealing with the raising of squashes in South Africa, another with the freezing of ice in the Arctic, and another dealing with the growing of potatoes in the Congo, there being as much relevancy between the titles of the bills and the various and sundry things we were dealing with as though a man were to undertake to unlock a door with one key and fail, and tomorrow undertake to do the same thing with the same key. We have had to vote for that kind of legislation here because it was the only method by which we could cast a vote at all. Those of us who have proposed other legislative alternatives have been voted down and have been forced to take the path of least resistance, which we have taken.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. There is another method by which Senators can vote. I voted against those bills because I thought they contained obviously unconstitutional provisions and were new departures in government. The Senator from Louisiana had exactly the same right that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and I had when we voted against them.

Mr. LONG. I voted against more of them than the Senator from Missouri voted against.

Mr. CLARK. I am perfectly willing to challenge that statement.

Mr. LONG. Well, I will let the RECORD decide the matter. I think I voted against more of these administration bills than the Senator from Missouri did.

Mr. CLARK. I am not speaking about administration bills. I am speaking about obviously unconstitutional measures.

Mr. LONG. I voted against more obviously unconstitutional measures, I think, than the Senator from Missouri did. I do not know which one of us has voted for the most, but I think I voted against more of them.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield, he has produced only two measures up to date, against both of which I voted, and for both of which he voted.

Mr. LONG. I will go a little further. The Senator has not been seated there long enough to listen to all of them. I will go down the list when the time comes. I have voted against most of them, but I shall have to plead guilty to having voted for some of them, which, in my opinion, are obviously unconstitutional; not such as the Supreme Court may necessarily hold to be unconstitutional but which, according to my judgment and understanding of the Constitution, are nowhere within the spirit and purpose of the Constitution of this country.

Then we came along with the A.A.A., and we passed that measure, placing it within the power of the President's boards and departments to do certain things.

Prior to that time we came along with the veterans' act, placing it within the power of the President of the United States to prescribe rules and regulations to decrease and do away with the compensations and the provisions that had been made for the veterans of our wars. I happened to vote against that.

Then we came along—without enumerating all of them—with one measure after the other until we have only one other upon which to legislate, and that is to give the President the right to declare war whenever there may be circumstances to justify that declaration.

That is all that is left of the power of Congress. When we pass this bill empowering the President of the United States to negotiate a treaty, to bargain for international commerce, to fix a term of 3 years beyond which even the Legislature itself cannot institute an act of repeal—whenever we go so far as to give him the right to tax, the right to make a treaty, the right to fix a period within which the Congress itself can act; when we go and involve the taxing power itself and place within his ipse dixit the right to banish a business under the N.R.A., if he wants to do that; the right to destroy a business under the treaty-making power, if he wants to do that; the right by which he can make a sheep out in Wyoming worth 30 cents tonight that might have been worth a dollar the day before; the right by which he can lay a sugar refinery waste with one stroke of his pen; the right by which he can close up every clothing manufacturing establishment on the coast of New England tomorrow; the right by which he can abolish every thread of commerce in this country, which is contained in this bill—then let us be gentlemen enough to be fair with the American people and give the President the one sole power remaining in Congress to declare war, and adjourn Congress and save the anxieties which the people have. [Laughter.]

We have ventured upon the experiment. How well has it worked? Let me just recount a bit.

How well has it worked? We have spent $16,000,000,000. Now, how well has it worked?

Have we materially enhanced the conditions of the farmers in this country? Go out among them and ask them. You will find, Mr. President, that although we concluded that we would venture upon the bold experiment which many of us, including myself, are to be condemned for yielding to for any purpose—and I indict myself as well as the Senator from Missouri might indict me for it, along with my other colleague here, for voting for much of it—when we went out on the bold experiment of expending $16,000,000,000, the end of which is not yet in sight, nor remotely prophesied at this time; when we went out and spent $16,000,000,000, as much as was owed to us by Europe, plus five billion more; more money than we already owed, and the national debt at that time was pronounced to be a staggering burden—when we went out and spent $16,000,000,000 in order that we might make the bold experiment of doing away altogether with legislative government, certainly we ought to have been pleased with the result of the experiment; or, if not pleased with the result of the experiment, we ought to be willing to admit at the end of a year and a half that the experiment of doing away with Congress is not working.

Has it worked with the farmer? Everyone knows it has not. The farmer today stands, regardless of all the various and sundry provisions that have been made, unable to realize the cost of production of the products of the farm.

It is true that there has been some moving up in commodity values; but an analysis will show that a bale of cotton today will buy only one half as many pairs of overalls as the same bale of cotton would have bought the day that the national election occurred on the 8th day of November 1932.

The bale of cotton itself is worth more money; but the bale of cotton will buy less clothes than the farmer could have bought with the same bale of cotton on the 8th day of November 1932 or the third day of March 1933. That is a fact which stands out. Notwithstanding the fact that we have done so much for cotton—and I am one of the southerners who will thank this Congress that it has done just as much for the cotton farmer as for any other farmer—and cotton, therefore, can be used as a straight line for the purposes of comparison; yet, with all that has been done, a bale of cotton will buy much less today of the actual necessities that a farmer must buy than the same bale of cotton would have bought before we took over the Government in 1933.

Has it worked in banking circles? Has doing away with the legislative branch of the Government worked in banking circles? With all that may be said in praise of what has been done for the banks, I still contend today that doing away with the little banks of the country has depreciated the currency of the United States—by which I mean the credit exchanges that were accepted for money throughout the country—many billions of dollars that did not need to have been depreciated.

Has it worked with the laboring element? Has the N.R.A. worked? Where is the report of Clarence Darrow and his committee that we were to have had by this time last week, but that we still cannot get hold of? Has it worked? I tell you it has not worked; and our administration has been fair and honest enough to admit that it has not worked, because it has raised the provisions of the N.R.A. Act insofar as it affects the small business man and has had to cancel out many of the arrangements insofar as it has affected other business. Instead of the N.R.A. working, the fault has been that Congress did not provide by mandatory legislative action of its own to meet the emergency which at that time existed.

Congress could have met the emergency in labor. It had its own bill here, a bill by which it would have drawn a line saying that at the end of 30 hours a man had done his week's labor. That was the bill proposed to Congress. It was argued with some ability on both sides of the Chamber that Congress did not have the right to impose a 30-hour law. It was argued with considerable genius that Congress did not have the right to fix a minimum wage. Regardless of whatever argument may have been made, none the less Congress at least possessed whatever power it could delegate to someone else to legislate on the subject; and so we have adopted a code system which has not worked, and which is not working at this time.

Take all the other experiments that we have tried: None of them, I contend, has topside or bottom proved itself to have anything like the efficacy that an ordinary legislative act would have had under the meaning and purport of the Constitution.

Now we come to the last one, the flexible tariff; or, rather, not the flexible tariff, but the proposal to give to the departments of this country the right to fix what are to be the terms of the interchange of trade with foreign countries.

I listened to the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I do not think anyone can dispute the soundness of the rule he laid down. I was in the caucus when my attention was called to what had been done under the McKinley Tariff Act and what had been done under the Dingley Tariff Act.

It had never been brought to my attention before, and I was surprised that it had not been; but after a little investigation I soon saw the vast difference between the rule therein laid down and what is proposed at this time, and even what was proposed under Mr. Hoover—an entirely different proposition, where the Congress, prescribing a rule, allowed the President either to suspend that rule or to put it into effect. That is an entirely different proposition which arose under the Dingley bill and under the McKinley tariff bill; but, coming to this provision, we now propose to give an unprecedented power to the President. If I would have given it to any President, I would give it to this President. If I would have given it to Mr. Hoover, if I would have given it to Mr. Harding or to Mr. Wilson, or, if I had been here in the days of Cleveland, if I had been willing to give this power to any of the Presidents whom I have mentioned, or any before them, if I had lived back in those days, I would be willing to give this power to the present President. Most of them, however, warned us against such power. Jefferson would not have accepted such power. It would not have been accepted, according to the declarations of most of the rest of the Presidents. Most of them not only would not have received it, but they would have stood aghast at the mention of it. They would have been like Washington when it was proposed to make him a king. They would have looked upon it as tearing down the one thing that kept a government imbedded among and in the hearts of the people, and responsible to them. They would have known that instead of men going back to their constituents, and instead of the lower House of Congress particularly being held accountable for its acts once every 2 years, they would have transferred the Government into the hands of an Executive, responsible only to the country as a whole once every 4 years; and in this particular instance an agreement is proposed to be made by the President which can stand as the law, irrevocable, 3 years after his own administration has come to an end.

This bill proposes not only to give power beycnd any which Congress could exert—because no act which Congress may pass can stand any longer than Congress is willing for it to stand—this bill proposes not only to allow a rule of law, or a treaty—the same as law—to stand during the pendency of an ordinary law, to stand during the term of an ordinary Executive, but it proposes to allow an Executive to project 3 years beyond his own term of office a law that it would be beyond the power of Congress to repeal.

This would mean that the President of the United States could negotiate a trade agreement with Cuba, and provide that Cuban sugar could come into the United States at a rate 50 percent below what it now bears, which would mean the immediate laying waste of the sugar industry not only of Louisiana but the sugar industry of the West as well.

The sugar refineries are dependent upon the will, upon the caprice of the Chief Executive, upon just what the President of the United States may think tomorrow morning. If Mr. Roosevelt gets up and decides that the sugar in his coffee is costing him too much, if he gets up and decides that the chocolate that is furnished for the afternoon bridge game is not sweet enough, he can decide then that he will take his pen and tear down every sugar refinery in the State of Louisiana, depopulate the sugar lands of the West, and lay absolutely barren the entire enterprise of sugar production by tomorrow morning. Not only that but we can go to the polls and defeat the Congress which gave him that authority, we can go to the polls and defeat him in his campaign for reelection, but still we would have that body of death tied around our necks for 3 more years after his term of office had expired, if he saw fit to take advantage of the power given to him by the Congress.

Out in the West the woolgrowers, we are told, are unnecessarily excited. I do not think they are excited half enough. It is said that wool has already fallen from 30 to 40 percent in its price. Now we are told that, as a result of that, the wool people have been given a gentleman's agreement. I have had some of those "gentlemen's agreements" myself. I do not know how well it is going to work with them.

I have had gentlemen's agreements once or twice myself. Sometimes they work, and sometimes they do not. But we are told that on account of the catastrophe that has already occurred by reason of people's being apprehensive on account of this abdication by Congress through this flexible tariff provision, by which the authority to make tariffs is to be given to the President, the price of wool has fallen 30 to 40 percent, and in order to keep wool from going down any further, the Department of Agriculture has had to give a letter to one of the Members of the Senate stating that they were not going to let the wool tariff be lowered if this bill shall be enacted.

Why not give me a letter? I am a Member here, too. If they can give a letter to the man who is representing some woolgrowers to the effect that they are not going to let the tariff on wool be lowered, why not give me a letter stating that they are not going to let the tariff on sugar or cotton be lowered?

I have a letter. I wonder whether Senators knew that. [Laughter.] I have a letter, and I am going to show that I have one. I have a letter which the President of the United States put into the paper in Baltimore year before last, during the campaign, in which he said that it was absolutely absurd to talk about lowering the tariff on agricultural products. I have a letter directed to the people of the United States, from the lips of the President of the United States, that it would be a monstrosity, an outrage, an absurdity, to lower the tariffs on agricultural commodities in the United States of America. If my letter is no good, the other letter is no good, either.

The other letter was from the same man who wrote mine. If there is a letter saying to the woolgrowers, "In order to keep your wool from going down any lower, in order to keep the wool which has already fallen 30 to 40 cents from falling 80 percent, I promise there will be no lower tariff on wool."

It is going to fall to about 20 percent before they get through with it, I am afraid. I hope not. When these tinkerers get to working on something they get all wound up. All you have to do is to let them tinker a little and mess up a little and they are just like one of these men coming out of an office and tinkering with an automobile. The only thing left on it will be the wheels, and they will take them off if they have time enough.

Are we to allow them to tinker with the tariff? It does not mean the President is going to tinker with the tariff. He cannot look into all these things. He is busy with more things than he can handle already. He has to give Mr. Wallace the job of fixing up agriculture. Mr. Wallace has said he wants to move a million farmers off the cotton land of the South to somewhere else. I do not know where he is going to move them, but he is going to take them somewhere. How about fixing the tariff on cotton? He will fix it up so as to make it possible to move a million men if he carries out his pet idea.

On the wool matter, the President will have Mr. Wallace helping, too. He is probably a better man than I am for that kind of a job. Mr. Tugwell is a good man, too.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. Speaking of Secretary Wallace, has the Senator noticed that he has corn for sale, which he is advertising in his magazine, that will produce 19 percent more of a crop? That is exactly the amount he intends to cut off in planting, and his corn will raise on the area of land that is left to be planted exactly the amount the farmer would have raised had he planted the ordinary corn on the land.

Mr. LONG. I wonder whether that magazine contains any advertisement of something that will kill hogs 19 percent faster. [Laughter.] If it does, then there is no kick to be made against Mr. Wallace. As I have said, I may be the only man here who will defend him, but I am still defending him.

We come, then, to another tariff item. He is going to regulate the tariff on tobacco. I am sorry the Senators from Georgia have left the Chamber. They worked long and laboriously to get a tariff on tobacco, the tobacco they raise in the shade, called wrapper tobacco. They raise that variety down in Georgia, and they raise it up in Massachusetts. He is going to fix that.

I do not mind saying that we have taken over as our brothers the people of Cuba. If you get a lot of people in the family, you know just what you are going finally to have to do.

A young man who was fixing to get married said, "I am only marrying the girl. I am not marrying the family." I said to him, "You may think you are marrying the girl, but you are marrying the family as well." [Laughter.]

So, when we took over Cuba we thought we were just extending our hand over them in a little friendly way, but according to the present policy we were marrying Cuba; we are taking Cuba over lock, stock, and barrel, and it has been suddenly discovered that we have not done our duty by Cuba.

Mr. President, the only way they are ever going to be satisfied that they have done their duty by Cuba is when they have exterminated the sugar lands of Louisiana and the West. Make up your mind to that. They say already that there is no defense of the beet-sugar business of the West and of the cane-sugar business of Louisiana. One of my friends in the Senate was bold enough to tell me once that the United States Government would have saved money if it had bought the sugar lands of this country and had never had any sugar planted, compared with the amount it had been out in tariff duties.

When they have finally done away with that industry what is the next thing they are going to do? There are a million pounds of tallow lying in foreign countries today, ready to be brought into the United States. They have that tallow piled up so high that it is in stacks that a man could not climb with a spirit level and a compass and any gliding mechanism he might put on his feet. He still could not get to the top of it. They have it there, waiting, with this big tallow pile that is going to be moved to the United States as soon as they can get a reciprocal tariff agreement that will permit them to bring it in. They will do it.

We fought against the oils of the Philippines, we fought against other tropical soap products, and, lo and behold, they are waiting not only to wipe out some of the things we have done in that direction, but to bring into this country a supply of tallow that will be sufficient to supply the soap market so long that cottonseed oil in the South and vegetable oil in the West and the East will not bring anything even within shooting distance of the price.

With all these theories about what ought to be done, Congress could not be persuaded to do them; the laws could not be passed through Congress.

The Senator from New York cannot get a law passed in Congress taking the tariff off manufactured clothes. Even had he tried to do it, he could not have had it passed. The Senator from Connecticut could not get the tariff taken off shoes, even if he tried to do it; and he is not going to try to do it. The Senators from the West could not get the tariff taken off sugar, if they tried to do it. They would not be left here long enough to complete the job by their people back home.

The Senator from Mississippi says we must not specify; that we must keep the pickle in the soak, but we must not tell who is to swallow it. If it ever does get out as to whom we are going to destroy, the whole kit and caboodle will be gone to the demnition bow wows. He said that if they found out just what we were fixing to do for them they would never let us get away with this thing. We have to keep them in the dark, he said—to keep that thing under the barrel. Do not let the little man who is drawing $2.50 a day making shoes know you are fixing to put him out of a job. He would be down here with a shotgun after Congress.

We ought to have passed the resolution saying, "Be it resolved by Congress that we have passed a law letting the President do whatever he pleases. Now we are going to quit and go home." That is what we ought to have done. But if we were to put in this bill today that we were going to cut the tariff on manufactured shoes, and they are going to cut either that or something else, what would they say? Or if we had put in the agricultural products, what would they have said? It got out that we were going to cut the price of wool, and what did they say? What is there honest about it?

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States first ought to be an honest Congress. That is the first thing Congress ought to be. Congress ought not to be legislating in the dark. We ought not to have it all rigged up to put a set of people out of business in this country and not be willing to tell them.

The Senator from Mississippi has gone. Perhaps someone will tell him what I say. Do I understand that Senators are afraid to put in this bill who it is with reference to whose products there is likely to be a cut in the tariff? Do I understand it be the sense of this Congress—and that is what the Senator from Mississippi certainly meant to say this morning—that Congress is afraid to put in here what it is going to exempt and what it is going to include?

Do I understand that the Congressmen are going back to the manufacturers of the East and the cotton farmers of the South and the sugar planters of Louisiana and of the Middle West and tell those people, "We have passed an act here which gives somebody the right to put you out of business, but just between you and me we think it is the other man who is going to be put out of business"? In other words, we sit down here in a game in which we have decided to cold-deck the other man. The hand is being dealt out in this game, and we are being told that we are in on a manipulation to put it on the other fellow, and we need not worry, that we are going to get a good hand. Well, we had better be sure we get the right hand.

Down my way we had an experiment of that kind. They took an old gentleman into a poker game and they said to him, "We are going to let you win this hand. We are going to make a good pot. We are going to deal this fellow over here four queens, and we are going to deal you four kings; and then I will take a small hand, and you will make a killing." The old fellow said, "What are you going to give me for the fifth card"? The man talking to him said, "I don't know—a 10 or a 9 or something." The old man said, "Give me an ace. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, we thought we had an agricultural agreement. We thought we had this thing fixed. I am pretty good at this business myself. I have been in this game of political trading for about 19 straight years. I have never been off the pay roll since I started, and that is a pretty good reputation. The secret of politics is "How long have you been in the work? How long can you stay there?" That is the proof as to whether or not you have been successful in politics. The minute you are moved away from the counter you are a political failure.

I have been at this business for 19 years—that is, when this present term is out, and I guess I have a fair chance of staying it out. But I thought I had an agreement; that I had a real agreement. I and all the farm people in this country thought we had an agreement. Where is that agreement made over here in Baltimore? I do not have it right before me, but I can quote it practically word for word. But when the President of the United States gave it utterance he was denounced by the then existing Secretary of Agriculture for having been willing to utter it, but the President said that it was an absurdity to talk about allowing the tariffs on any farmers and agricultural products to be reduced.

Representing an agricultural State, that was sufficient for me. What would it have meant to some Senators if he had said that it was an absurdity to talk about allowing a reduction in the tariff on wool? Senators certainly would not have expected them to come in here with a provision to reduce the wool tariff, would they?

It is said that there is an agreement, that there is an understanding. I do not know whether they are going to write it in this bill or not. I suggest that we come right out in the open. If there is a letter or an agreement which it is thought is going to protect anyone I am willing to go the full distance and help him protect himself to the full limit of the law, and I am willing to have it written into the law that wool is not to be included as one of the commodities that can be affected by a reciprocal tariff agreement, but whether others have such a letter, we have a letter, which I thought was sufficient. It ought to be sufficient, because it is a promise and a pledge to the American people that the President will not do any such a thing as to reduce the tariff on agricultural commodities.

We have now a surplus of agricultural commodities. We have a surplus of wool, we have a surplus of cattle, and I take it that we have a surplus of hogs. We have a surplus of corn, a surplus of wheat, a surplus of rye, a surplus of barley, a surplus of potatoes, a surplus of sugarcane, a surplus of sugar beets, considering what Cuba is allowed to import here and what is allowed to come in here from the Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Hawaii.

What are we now going to do? Are we now going to say that we will allow them to add to this surplus? There is nothing in this bill which says anything else. All we have to depend upon is the promise of the President. That is what we were led to believe in the campaign and that is what we are entitled to depend upon now.

First, Mr. President, we ought to pause and take stock as to how far we are going in this kind of legislation. We ought to pause and consider first whether or not it is constitutional.

Second, even though we think that the Supreme Court will stand for it, whether or not this trend of abolishing legislative government is a wise thing to do; and

Third, whether or not we should hazard every business and every enterprise to a transitory power, to a sword that is hung above its head, which may mean its life or may mean its destruction, and we ought in connection with that to say whether or not our growing public debt and surplus problems are made with these experiments, none of which have proved satisfactory to this time.

PROCEDURE IN IMPEACHMENT PROCEEDINGS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S.Res. 242) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in the trial of any impeachment the Presiding Officer of the Senate, upon the order of the Senate, shall appoint a committee of 12 Senators to receive evidence and take testimony at such times and places as the committee may determine; and for such purpose the committee so appointed and the chairman thereof, to be elected by the committee, shall (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) exercise all the powers and functions conferred upon the Senate and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, respectively, under the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials.

Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials shall govern the procedure and practice of the committee so appointed. The committee so appointed shall report in writing to the Senate upon the completion of the taking of testimony, including therein a certified transcript of the same, and such report shall be received by the Senate, and the evidence so received and the testimony so taken shall be considered to all intents and purposes as having been received and taken before the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, to what committee is it requested that the resolution be referred?

Mr. ASHURST. To the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator consider the resolution so important that it ought to be adopted at this session?

Mr. ASHURST. I have no intention, Mr. President, of discussing the resolution I have submitted. It will be remembered that last May there was an impeachment trial in the conduct of which the rules of the Senate were punctiliously observed, and I have no comment to make on the result. Many Senators, however—I believe a majority on each side of the aisle—suggested that the Committee on the Judiciary study the question whether or not under the Constitution, when articles of impeachment are presented at the bar of the Senate by the managers on the part of the House, a committee of Senators may take the testimony instead of its being required that the testimony be adduced in the open Senate.

After a study of some 6 months—although many lawyers, members of my own committee, abler than I, do not agree with me—I am profoundly convinced that the Senate has full power and authority to appoint a committee to hear and take the testimony, to confer on that committee the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to compel them to testify under oath. The resolution I have submitted merely provides that such a special committee shall hear the testimony, have the testimony taken down in shorthand, have it transcribed and certified to the Senate; and, of course, after the testimony shall have been taken, certified, and printed, the Senate itself will vote upon the question of finding guilty or not guilty the respondent in any impeachment trial.

It is not intended, of course, to deprive the Senate of the right to vote. In fact, that would certainly be unconstitutional. I wish to say, however, that the Senate could, if it wished to run wild, convict a respondent without any evidence, though, of course, it would not do such a thing. Obviously therefore, the Senate may pass upon an impeachment trial on the basis of a small amount of evidence, even evidence taken by affidavit.

I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Rules; and, in answer to the question of the Senator from New York, I will say that I think it ought to be adopted at an early date. I do not wish to advert to what may take place within the next 2 or 3 weeks; but I will state that I am certainly sportsman enough, if I am not statesman enough, to refrain from endeavoring to change the rules of procedure after a case shall have been commenced.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, speaking for a moment as Chairman of the Committee on Rules, it seems to me that this is rather an unusual responsibility to place upon that particular committee. It would seem to me that the Judiciary Committee, having in charge legal matters, should consider the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary? The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be so referred.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I feel as does the Senator from Arkansas, that the resolution should more properly be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary because of the far-reaching significance of the procedure from a legal standpoint.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the first question that will arise, I anticipate, is a question of the power of the Senate to proceed to take evidence in impeachment proceedings by a committee. I have made some investigation of the subject, and am inclined to think that, if the Senate chooses to pursue that course, it may do so. Nevertheless, I believe that the primary question is a legal one, and I think the jurisdiction properly lies in the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COPELAND. I feel that way, too, because fundamentally it is a legal and constitutional question. If the Judiciary Committee or if the Senate should afterward decide that it is a desirable thing to do, then so far as procedure is concerned in the making of a rule, that subject might properly go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, several months ago, indeed immediately following the impeachment case to which the Senator from Arizona just referred, I took up the matter with the able chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, and informally discussed it. I am very much in sympathy with the resolution offered; indeed, I think some steps should be taken along the line indicated in the resolution. I believe, too, that the resolution should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, when I asked that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules it was not with the intention of shirking an obvious duty and the labor involved, but because of my inborn desire not to raise the implication that, having proposed a very important resolution, I wanted my own committee to consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter has been disposed of. The Chair asked if there was objection to the resolution going to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair heard no objection, and ordered the resolution so referred.

HOUR OF MEETING

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NcNARY] if he will consent that tomorrow the Senate shall convene at 11 o'clock a.m.?

Mr. McNARY. May we not meet at 12 o'clock noon? There is an important meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to say nothing of meetings of other committees. I think we should have notice of such a change in the hour of meeting. Let us go forward tomorrow at 12 o'clock as usual. Next week we may make an arrangement for an earlier hour of meeting if the Senator desires.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. I shall not insist if the Senator feels that way about it.

EXERCISES IN COMMEMORATION OF DEATH OF GENERAL LA FAYETTE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on next Sunday morning at 11 o'clock in the Hall of the House of Representatives a joint session of the Senate and the House of Representatives will be held in commemoration of the anniversary of the death of General La Fayette. It is expected that the Senate will convene at 10:45 o'clock a.m. and proceed in a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

I am giving this notice now in order that Senators may be advised in advance and, if practicable, may make their week-end engagements so as to participate in the proceedings.

The occasion will be memorable. An address will be delivered by the President. It is hoped and desired that Senators may find it practicable to attend.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION REPORTS TO N.R.A.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, yesterday there was adopted by the Senate a resolution, Senate Resolution 240, calling on the Federal Trade Commission for certain correspondence and reports. The resolution was presented by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

COMMEMORATION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF DANIEL BOONE

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 17), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3355) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, to correct an error therein.

INVESTIGATION OF SO-CALLED "BOOK TRUST"

Mr. CLARK submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 243), which was read, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Whereas it has been openly published and charged for a period of years that the American Book Co. and other textbook concerns, commonly known as the "Book Trust", all dealing in textbooks and schoolbooks, throughout the country, have been engaged in unlawful practices in obtaining of contracts for furnishing schoolbooks through State legislation, and from public officials in States, and that, in the obtention of these contracts to furnish textbooks, it is charged that they have used large sums of money for entertainment and use of various officials; and,

Whereas it was published in the newspapers on Saturday, May 5, 1934, that, in a secret N.R.A. Code hearing held in Washington, D.C., in April 1934, it was disclosed that $500,000 had been paid out by the textbook manufacturers for "meals" and other gratuities to public officials having to do with the purchase of school textbooks for the children and the youth of our country; and,

Whereas these books are sold in interstate commerce: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a committee of 5 Members of the Senate—not more than 3 members from any one political party—which committee is authorized and directed, during the session of the Senate, and during the recess of the Congress, to examine into such charges made concerning the book manufacturers selling books in interstate commerce, and report its findings to the next Congress.

For the purpose of this resolution, the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Congress until the final report is submitted, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $20,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

GEORGE A. FOX

Mr. WALSH. From the Committee on Naval Affairs, I report back favorably without amendment Senate bill 3586, for the relief of George A. Fox; and I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that the bill be read, and, if there is no objection, that it be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The legislative clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint George A. Fox, chief pharmacist's mate, United States Navy, a chief pharmacist in the Navy, subject to qualification on physical examination, with the pay and allowance provided by law for chief warrant officers after 20 years' commissioned service and with creditable record: Provided, That no back pay, allowances, or emoluments shall become due prior to the date of this act.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas explain the reasons for requesting immediate action on the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, during the illness of President Wilson, Mr. Fox was assigned to attend and to assist him. He served in that capacity and is now attached to the White House. Under the circumstances, this is the only provision that can be made for him.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas has stated the facts as the committee understands them. I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the nomination of Raleigh A. Gibson, of Illinois, now a Foreign Service officer of class 6 and a consul, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

Without objection, the first nomination on the calendar will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters will be confirmed en bloc.

HENRY R. PARK

Mr. HARRISON. On behalf of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], I report back favorably the nomination of Henry R. Park to be postmaster at Merigold, Miss. Some exceptional circumstances were presented to me by the Representative in whose district this post office is located, and I ask unanimous consent that the nomination may be confirmed at this time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what is the nomination?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be read.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Henry R. Park to be postmaster at Merigold, Miss.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

IN THE NAVY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotion of officers in the Navy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Navy be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, May 18, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 17, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Once more, our Heavenly Father, through Thy loving providence, we have the promise and the hope of another day. Out of the mercy of grateful hearts, may we thank Thee. Come Thou, Almighty God, and reign over us. We rejoice amid the perils of life; we are safe not in our own virtue but in Thy guardianship and in the plenitude of the Father's love and care. The stress of circumstances, the conflicts of temptation, the burdens of duty bring heavenly teachings out of the clouds. We pray for a courageous faith in God, a steadfast trust in Him, our Savior. In these great qualities of soul there is a compelling expectation. Gracious Lord, bless the truth, winnow it, that the pure and the good may remain an abiding reality and a sweet memory. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, May 15, 1934, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 9061. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. GLASS, Mr. COPELAND, Mr. KING, Mr. NYE, and Mr. KEYES to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5950) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the reports of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 2080. An act to provide punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers;

S. 2249. An act applying the powers of the Federal Government, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to extortion by means of telephone, telegraph, radio, oral message, or otherwise;

S. 2252. An act to amend the act forbidding the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce;

S. 2253. An act making it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution in certain cases;

S. 2575. An act to define certain crimes against the United States in connection with the administration of Federal penal and correctional institutions and to fix the punishment therefor;

S. 2841. An act to provide punishment for certain offenses committed against banks organized or operating under laws of the United States or any member of the Federal Reserve System; and

S. 2845. An act to extend the provisions of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act to other stolen property.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills, joint resolutions, and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2527. An act to amend the act of May 29, 1930, for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service;

S. 3285. An act to provide for the regulation of interstate and foreign communications by wire or radio, and for other purposes;

S. 3436. An act limiting the operations of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to counsel in certain proceedings against the Electro-Metallurgical Co., New-Kanawha Power Co., and the Union Carbide & Carbon Corporation;

S.J.Res. 121. Joint resolution authorizing the President to return the mace of the Parliament of upper Canada to the Canadian Government;

S.J.Res. 123. Joint resolution empowering certain agents authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to administer oaths to applicants for tax-exemption certificates under the Cotton Act of 1934; and

S.Con.Res. 16. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Senate, in the enrollment of the bill S. 2845, to correct an error.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3364) entitled "An act for the relief of G. T. Fleming."

The message also announced that, pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution No. 37, the Chair appoints, as the members on the part of the Senate of the joint committee to arrange a program for the joint session of the two Houses on May 20, 1934, in commemoration of the death of Marquis de La Fayette, the following: The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, several days ago the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY] delivered a very able address over the radio, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following very able address delivered over the radio by the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. DISNEY:

I have the honor and privilege of speaking to you on one of the most interesting subjects that is being discussed throughout the length and breadth of our land—old-age pensions—a subject that has occupied the attention of nearly all the nations of the globe.

In dealing with any problem we should first obtain facts and statistics regarding it and then formulate a policy in order to bring about its solution. If the question is debated, the solution is more easily reached; and if it has been tested, it is then possible to determine whether or not it is practical.

In every civilized country of the world, excepting China and India, the principle of the old-age pension has been adopted. Thirty countries in all, including the principal industrial countries of Europe, have enacted old-age-insurance laws in some form. As long ago as 1850 France passed the first old-age insurance law, which provided a voluntary system of insurance for all residents of France, irrespective of age or disability.

Germany was the first country to provide compulsory old-age insurance, the initial legislation passed in 1889 covering all wage earners, independent workers, and home industrialists; and Great Britain's compulsory old-age insurance law of 1925 covers all manual and nonmanual workers who earn less than 250 pounds annually.

In 1898 Italy enacted a voluntary system for all persons between the ages of 16 and 65 who paid in direct taxes to the State not more than 500 lire per annum and independent workers and members of the liberal professions. All these persons were covered in the compulsory insurance act of 1919, as amended in 1928, provided that those earning 800 lire per month or more might claim exemption from the compulsory insurance.

Czechoslovakia has two compulsory old-age insurance laws, one passed in 1906 covering all salaried employees and another enacted in 1924 for all wage earners.

Holland has had a compulsory-insurance system since 1913 for all wage earners over 14 years of age earning less than 2,000 florins annually. A voluntary insurance law for all Netherlanders regardless of residence, income, and property qualifications, was passed in 1919.

Sweden's compulsory law of 1913 provides that all citizens between the ages of 17 and 67, except persons covered by the pension systems for civil servants and for the Army and Navy, shall contribute to the insurance fund.

In Spain a compulsory-insurance law passed in 1919 covers all wage earners between the ages of 16 and 65 who earn less than 4,000 pesetas annually.

Switzerland has no Federal law, but five cantons have insurance systems, the earliest passed in 1898 and the most recent in 1930.

Other European compulsory-insurance systems have been established by Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Greece, Hungary, Lithuania, Luxemburg, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, and Yugoslavia.

Canada established a compulsory system for all employees of the Government railways in 1907, and a voluntary system in 1908 for all residents of the Dominion.

Our country can join in the solution of this problem, as well as the other economic problems of the day.

In the bill I introduced in the first session of the present Congress is a provision providing for a pension of $30 a month for persons over 60 years of age, with certain conditions and restrictions.

Fifty years ago the number of persons in the United States over that age was about a million; today it is over 6,000,000. One third of these are in the almshouses and charitable institutions and over a billion dollars in charity a year is expended in their maintenance.

This is charity, but what true-blooded American wants charity? Charity of a kind that does not come from the heart, but is doled out to those whose means of subsistence is gone and whose homes are destroyed never to be regained. A man without a home is a man without a country.

Industry in general refuses the application of the man who has passed the age of 45, no matter how able-bodied or useful he may be, or appear to be. Even the Federal Government in its civil-service applications has until recently refused to consider those who are of certain mature ages.

As stated by Hon. William M. Brucker, formerly Governor of the State of Michigan, "Penury in advanced age is a misfortune which may beset us all", and as our own illustrious President, who, when Governor of New York, in advocating consideration of a wider, contributory insurance plan, declared: "Our American aged do not want charity, but rather old-age comforts to which they are rightfully entitled."

Insurance for aged and infirm people is based on a principle as broad and as sound as humanity itself—that is, brotherly love—but it can properly be classed as sound business judgment to give the individual during his earlier years the assurance that in his later life he shall not be set adrift on charity.

To furnish a human being with the necessities of life through the medium of public charity is obnoxious to the donor, repugnant to the recipient, and a degradation to the public mind. It induces poverty, squalor, and crime because of its tendency to disarm pride and independence.

A pension or insurance advanced as a legal heritage, based on the broad ground of paying a moral obligation which the Government owes those citizens who have supported it, and who became needy, stimulates and encourages its beneficiaries to usefulness and endeavor. Public begging and public almsgiving have impoverished every nation in history that has permitted this evil to thrive. Like a cancer, it eats its way in the public heart, destroys public confidence, fosters hypocrisy, and brings human fear of old age and poverty.

Aid extended by a kindly government inspires loyalty, patriotism, and encourages human kindness and friendliness; more especially it promotes a spirit of cooperation that is for the benefit of organized society itself.

From all the facts and figures available it costs no more, if as much, to support the aged under an insurance system than it does at the poor farm, so that business men need not flinch at the suggestion that the tax burden is enlarged.

Old-fashioned America once stood aghast at the sight of the laborers of the country going to work in their own automobiles, but industry has found that the best workmen are those satisfied with the comforts of life. Industry was not adversely affected by its artisans having their own automobiles and other luxuries. Yesterday's paper carried an interview by Frank A. Vanderlip, one-time Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and for 10 years head of the biggest bank in the United States, the State National Bank of New York City, in which he advocated the principles for which I am contending, and recognized the necessity for handling the old-age pension problem in his advocacy of old-age annuities.

I would repeat that industry does not need to fear a people, which in its twenties, thirties, and forties, feels sure that it will be taken care of in its fifties and sixties.

Why has the last half century witnessed in the United States (not in any other country) the greatest age of creative inventive genius known to history? The answer is: A citizenship certain and satisfied and therefore mentally free, that under our form of government, our Constitution, and our bill of rights, their homes, persons, families, and property rights would be secure. This individual mentality arose in no other nation. In no other nation has the individual had the mental freedom that he has enjoyed in America.

I predict that before any great stretch of time, that those necessities of life, food, shelter, and clothing, those things that worry our days and nights, put upon us a badge of fear and care, that drives men to the suicide's grave, will become mere incidents in the life of tomorrow; that they will be substantially free to him who will expend a minimum of effort then required to acquire them, those things that God gave us for our use and benefit. This requires no stretch of the imagination, but simply honest reasoning. The kings of yesterday with all their riches did not have electric lights, airplanes, automobiles, radios; they could not be had for all the riches of the Indias. Today they are mere incidents of the average man's life. The luxuries of yesterday are the necessities of today.

The new deal for social justice would seem necessarily to include the whole plan of assuring the useful citizen of today that he will not be the pauper and the beggar of tomorrow. If the new deal drives discouragement and despondency from the land and replaces them with the calm, certain assurance that old age shall not mean penury, then this epoch is indeed a landmark of history.

In passing permit me to say to my audience that the assurances of the success of the new deal and the certainty of the success of the recovery program are each day appearing in the Nation's Capital, making assurance doubly sure. Of course, certain of the opposition hold up their hands in holy horror at the President's budget of $10,000,000,000, but they overlooked his frankness in telling us what the country needed and when it might expect the liquidation of the debt and the balancing of the Budget. And, too, they refused to notice the headlines of the newspapers which carried the news of the $10,000,000,000-Budget, for blazoned on every other headline was such encouraging news as these: "Biggest Christmas trade in history of New York; world cotton activity near 1929 level; pig-iron output gains 52 percent; big come-back by industrial firms; Prudential Insurance Co. pays $79,000,000 dividends; shoe sales increase 50 percent; grain prices higher; cattle and hog prices stronger." Not much consolation for the oracles of gloom and despair, I should say.

As stated by W. A. Pat Murphy, commissioner of labor of my own State of Oklahoma, "The United States is the richest and foremost nation in the world. It is the only industrial nation in the world which has failed to realize the necessity of providing ways and means of taking care of its veterans of hard work and toil. Think of the plight of these old people confronted with unemployment as they approach the sunset of life, inevitable dependents on public assistance. Men and women, many of whom are without children to whom they might look to for support, victims of circumstances over which they have no control, caused by changed industrial operations, they being trained in occupations which no longer exist. Men and women striving to conceal, rather than parade, their poverty."

Can you imagine a sadder sight than the hungry man searching for employment and no one wanting to hire him because of his age? With industry neglecting him, with what weary feet of discouragement he plods on.

This problem confronts you and me. It is not new by any means.

Thomas Carlyle said: "It is not to die, nor even to die of hunger that makes a man wretched. Many men have died. All must die.' But it is to live miserably, we know not why. To work hard and gain nothing. To be heartworn, weary yet isolated, unrelated, with a cold universal doctrine of 'let well enough alone.'"

This is the reason I come to the defense of our elderly people. This is the human need for which the ages cry out, and in such way as we can, we shall endeavor to meet that plea of the Psalmist when he said, "Cast me not off in the time of old age. Forsake me not when my strength faileth."

The bill I have been discussing is as follows:

H.R. 7019

A bill to provide old-age compensation for the citizens of the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who gives satisfactory proof to the authority hereinafter designated that he or she (a) has reached the age of 65 years; (b) has been a citizen of the United States for 20 consecutive years; (c) who is not in receipt of an income from any source of over $360 per year, shall be entitled to receive until death a pension from the United States Government of $30 per month.

SEC. 2. That if such person has other income, then his pension shall be rated in proportion to such income, so his total income, including pension, shall not exceed $360 per annum: Provided, That any amount paid under the provisions of this act to any pensioner shall be a lien on the estate of said pensioner, the title to which shall automatically pass to the United States of America, and shall be collected by the said Federal Commissioner of Pensions and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. That no person shall be paid a pension under the provisions of this act until he voluntarily withdraws from the field of competitive earning: Provided, That the occupation of agriculture shall not be hereby deemed as a field of competitive earning where the total area of land so cultivated shall not exceed 5 acres, and where no products of said 5 acres are sold or bartered or offered for sale or barter.

SEC. 4. The provisions of this act shall be administered by the Director of Pensions, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, at a salary of $7,500 per annum, payable monthly, said appointment to be for a term of 4 years or until removed by the President. Said Director of Pensions shall be empowered to set up machinery and organization for carrying this act into effect, and for maintaining its administration and for such other purposes as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. In order to provide sufficient income for the purpose of this act it is provided that a levy of one half of 1 percent of all salaries, earnings, income, etc., of all persons between the ages of 21 and 45, inclusive, be paid into the Postal Savings Division of the Post Office Department and to be deposited in a fund designated as the "old-age pension fund."

SEC. 6. That an advisory board be created, said advisory board to consist of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Labor, who, in conjunction with the Director of Pensions, shall have the power and authority to scale downward or reduce the tax on earnings to any figure under the specified one half of 1 percent, provided it is found that the lower rate will be sufficient to take care of the necessary demands upon the pension fund.

SEC. 7. The benefits under this act shall not be granted to any person who has, within 5 years prior to making application for compensation, deprived himself, directly or indirectly, of any property for the purpose of qualifying for benefits hereunder.

SEC. 8. The benefits under this act shall not be granted to any person while an inmate of an insane asylum, eleemosynary institution, or while under penal sentence in any jail or prison.

EXTENDING THE TIME FOR AMERICAN CLAIMANTS TO MAKE APPLICATION FOR PAYMENT UNDER THE SETTLEMENT OF WAR CLAIMS ACT OF 1928

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 325, extending for 2 years the time within which American claimants may make application for payment, under the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission and the Tripartite Claims Commissions, and extending until March 10, 1936, the time within which Hungarian claimants may make application for payment under the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928 of awards of the war claims arbiter, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. DOUGHTON, Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL, Mr. CULLEN, Mr. TREADWAY, and Mr. BACHARACH.

AMENDING THE GRAIN FUTURES ACT

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, by direction of that committee, reported the following resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

House Resolution 387 (Rept. No. 1663)

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9623, a bill to amend the Grain Futures Act, to prevent and remove obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grains and other commodities by regulating transactions therein on commodity-futures exchanges, by providing means for limiting short selling and speculation in such commodities on such exchanges, by licensing commission merchants dealing in such commodities for future delivery on such exchanges, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has just messaged over the bill H.R. 9061, making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, the District bill, with amendments, and the bill with the Senate amendments is now on the Speaker's table. The Senate has taken the rather unconventional course of insisting on its amendments and asking conference, and has appointed conferees before the House was apprised of the disposition of the bill and without giving the House an opportunity to agree to the amendments.

In view of this intimation on the part of the Senate that its amendments are of such a nature that the House cannot be expected to agree to them, I ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CANNON of Missouri, Mr. BLANTON, and Mr. JACOBSEN, Mr. DITTER, and Mr. POWERS.

WAR DEBTS AND SOME FACTS IN CONNECTION THEREWITH

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the House on a matter which I believe to be at this time uppermost in the minds of the American people. I refer to the subject of the debts due and owing to this country by the foreign nations.

To refresh our memories it might be well at this point to say that in 1923, when the debt-funding agreements were entered into, Great Britain owed us $4,600,000,000, which we agreed to cancel if they paid 3.3-percent interest for a period of 62 years.

France owed us at the same time $4,025,000,000 and we agreed if she paid us 1.6-percent interest for 62 years, her debt would be cancelled.

Italy owed us $2,042,000,000, which we agreed we would cancel if she paid us 0.4 of 1 percent interest over the same period of time.

It must be remembered that we borrowed all this money from our citizens, on which we pay at least 4-percent interest. Our approximate loss in interest alone, from the date of the refunding of these debts (or 11 years) was $2,200,000,000.

Another thing it might be well to mention at this point is when we went to Europe with our supplies and our men to fight for the Allies France thought they ought to have duty on all our imports and did collect on them for some time. They also made us pay for all buildings and trenches taken over by our forces. They made us agree to sell them all our supplies after the war. When the war closed we inventoried our supplies and found we had $2,000,000,000 worth of supplies in France, but France at first said they could not pay us $2,000,000,000 but would pay us 20 percent, which was $400,000,000, and when we attempted to include this amount in what they owed us at the time of the debt settlements they refused to permit the item to be included, and we actually donated them $2,000,000,000 worth of supplies.

I will leave it to your judgment whether or not the United States has been fair and just with our debtors, especially in the case of France.

The enormous sum of $12,000,000,000 is now outstanding and remains unpaid. It is obvious that no earnest effort is being made to discharge these debts. I believe a frank discussion of this question is not only timely but imperative. We have been coddled along with this excuse and that excuse as reasons for nonpayment during the past several years, and the time has now arrived when we should, I think, begin to doubt seriously the good faith of some of our debtors in the representations they have been making of their inability to meet these past-due obligations.

If it were plainly a case of inability to pay on the part of these foreign nations, then I would be the last one on this floor to question the good faith of their varied excuses. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that such is not the case. The greater part of the debts due our Nation is owing by the nations of Great Britain and France. It is only within the past few weeks that Great Britain published figures showing a surplus of some $200,000,000 for the fiscal year just closed, but no mention was made of the debt they owe us. In view of these figures, can it be truthfully said that Great Britain is unable to make some substantial payment on her indebtedness to this country? I think not. And in the case of France, the nation with the second largest gold holdings in the world, can it be truthfully contended that she is not in a financial position to commence payments on her obligations to our country?

When our Nation devalued the gold content of the dollar to the extent of approximately 60 percent of its former value, did we not thereby practically double the value of her gold holdings in terms of our dollars? Why then is she not in a position at the present time, with the enormous increase in the value of her gold holdings in terms of our dollar, to apply at least some of the increased value to the discharge of her indebtedness to us? By devaluation of the gold content of our dollar, we have automatically cut the amount of this indebtedness in half, in terms of American dollars.

If Great Britain and France show no disposition at the present time to consider seriously the payment of these obligations, are we not justified in the conclusion that they never intend to pay? And, if we are justified in this conclusion, should not our Nation, without further delay and procrastination, look to some means or methods of enforcing collection?

I realize that this is a delicate subject for discussion because of the diplomatic relations involved, but I submit that public sentiment throughout the country over this question is being aroused to such an extent that the American people will soon be demanding action, and vigorous action, regardless of the consequences, in a final disposition of this matter.

I make bold to assert that there are means and measures that can be taken by our country to bring these debtors to some sense of their moral and legal obligations. We have recently thrown down the bars on the unlimited importations of liquor and wines from both Great Britain and France into this country. I question the wisdom of this policy when it appears to me it would be no more than good business judgment for this Government to place an embargo on such importations until such time as these two nations would come to some terms on the payment of their indebtedness to us. There are other nations that are not in total default or that do not owe us anything that could supply the needs of our Nation with high-grade wines and liquors just as well as Great Britain and France. Scotch whiskies are no better than Canadian or Irish whiskies. French wines are no better than Italian or German wines. Why permit any defaulting nations to reap the harvest of the large importations of these wines and liquors, so long as they refuse to make an honest effort to discharge at least a substantial part of their large past due indebtedness? It is only by such an embargo on these and other articles that can be imported as well from other countries against these defaulting nations that we are ever going to collect any substantial sum.

You know, and I know, that they are not going to favor us in any particular trade relationships to enable us to gain any advantage in international commerce. If I owe you a sum of money, Mr. Speaker, and the matter of payment on same is in dispute between us, it is only natural that until the matter is adjusted in some definite terms, I am not going to do any business with you to your advantage. That is only human nature, and it applies to nations as well as to individuals.

It is my firm conviction that unless our Nation takes some immediate and determined steps to enforce such an embargo against these defaulting nations we may as well decide that we will never receive payment of this huge indebtedness. Mr. Speaker, I favor such an embargo now.

THOROUGHNESS, COURAGEOUSNESS, AND UNSELFISHNESS

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the gentleman from New York, Mr. CELLER, at the commencement exercises of boys' high school of Brooklyn, January 31, 1934:

"Commencement", at first blush, seems a misnomer. Why should the "commencement" be the ending of a 4-year period of instruction? It is like the Roman god, Janus, with two heads facing opposite directions. Tonight marks the ending of a creditable course of study and the beginning or facing of a new era for each one of you. It is also like opening the door into another room. Going through that portal marked "commencement" is indicative of the fact that nothing in this life is conclusive. There is never an ending. Just as the great Roosevelt said recently, "Civilization does not stand still", you, who make up that civilization, cannot stand still. You must move ever onward. Your triumph of 4 years is but the threshold leading to another conquest, beyond which is another door leading to a fresh experience.

It is well, however, at this state of your progress through life—this resting place—to wipe your brow and take out a compass and sextant to find your whereabouts.

You will discover that we are living in parlous times—times that try men's souls. In the protected surroundings of boys' high school, you may not have fully realized the economic perils that besiege us. One can never see the mountain near. One must permit one's self a perspective before one can appreciate the majesty and magnificence of the mountain. We who are making history cannot grasp its full import. Posterity shall render the true verdict.

It has been brought home to most of us, however, even our youth, that we are in an economic maelstrom. The future looks to you, vigorous youth, blest with 4 years of fruitful training, for assistance and even leadership in the effort to steer our course away from this peril.

As I look into your faces I see marked indelibly thereon utmost sincerity, a will to achieve, and even a desire to lead. I know that you do not wish to be dumb, driven cattle, but prefer to be the heroes in the strife. I do not wish to be guilty of preachment and have no desire to deliver a dull lecture. I would dispel the popular theory that Congressmen are given to drab and tiresome oratory. This remark brings to mind one of my favorite stories. A young lad was carrying a tremendous burden of newspapers and magazines. A sympathetic old lady, seeing him stagger along under their weight, said, "My poor boy! Don't you find those papers tiring?" "No ma'am," he said, "I never read them."

I hope I may not be tiring.

In the pursuit of my own ideals and quest for happiness since my graduation in 1906 from boys' high school, I have found that one more easily avoids the pitfalls and levels the barriers if one is thorough, courageous, and unselfish.

Many of the tragedies of public and private life are caused by failure to think things through and act them through. We find the dilettante everywhere. His is an easy, care-free existence. He is rarely a success and most often a complete failure. Comparatively few men take the time to get to the heart of a matter, but, ever remember, that concentration is the price of success. Your training shall have been for naught unless and until you have learned thoroughness. It may be a habit hard to acquire, but it is a pearl of great price. Strange as it may seem, and this is said with no desire to be offensive or hypercritical, one of the most prominent men in the United States today, the veteran Senator Blank, lacks thoroughness—congressional courtesy precludes my naming him. In the slang of the moment, he is a "trimmer." He criticizes mercilessly. However, he merely trims the edges and never gets to the crux of the matter. It is a rather curious truth that there never has been a bill passed by both Houses of Congress which bears the name of Senator Blank. Let us look at the other side of the shield. Senator WAGNER, quite the junior of Blank in years and in service in the Senate, is a hard-working, hard-hitting, thorough-going legislator. He works incessantly and proceeds from the very edge to the center. Many bills bear his name. He is no mere faultfinder.

One of my favorite characters in American history is Grover Cleveland. He was by no means a genius. He did not have the great intellectual qualities of a Hamilton or a Lincoln. He did, however, possess a rugged honesty, firmness, common sense, and complete thoroughness. When this country was in dispute with England over the Venezuelan boundary line, Cleveland spent days without end in studying the situation. No details were too great for him to master. His Secretary of State Olney had prepared a message of protest but with circumspect care and thoroughness Cleveland revised it. It became an historical document and brought proud England to her knees and forced upon her settlement of the boundary dispute. It was Cleveland's courage and thoroughness that prevented Great Britain from making a willful aggression upon the South American Continent in violation of the Monroe Doctrine.

In the journey along life's highway, courage is a prime requisite. President Roosevelt's outstanding characteristic is courage. When he embarked upon his public career, he must have vowed that he would banish indecision and vacillation. When he was Governor he was confronted with the charges against Mayor Walker. He had to make a quick and courageous decision. He took his political life in his hands. He knew that a judgment against the mayor involved the hostility of a huge political organization that would wreak its vengeance upon him. Roosevelt cared not and vigorously decided against the mayor. This was courage of the highest order. Achilles could be justly envious.

Within a few minutes of taking the oath of office as President of the United States, he was faced with making a decision which was, to my mind, the most momentous in the history of our country. The banks of our Nation were closing with astonishing rapidity. A crisis had been reached. Something had to be done immediately. Rare wisdom was required. Roosevelt was keenly aware that action was imperative. Indecisiveness was inconceivable. Experience and training had taught him that vacillation in such instances invariably meant tragedy. In the language of Hamlet, "If 'twere done, 'twere well 'twere done quickly." He took pen in hand, and without hesitancy, signed the order proclaiming the national banking holiday. History does not reveal the name of the monarch or President who, upon his immediate assumption of power, closed all the money marts, banks, and exchanges of a nation. It took courage of an unearthly order to do this. It is this type of courage you should take unto your own hearts. It is such courage that solves the multitudinous problems which now confront us.

It was this same brand of courage which caused the immortal Lincoln, as a matter of military expediency, to draft the Emancipation Proclamation.

Let me illustrate with another historic incident. Jefferson Davis was President of the Confederacy. Judah P. Benjamin, former Senator from Louisiana, was his Secretary of War. The aristocracy of the South viewed him with disfavor. Jefferson Davis, knowing Benjamin's rare ability, courageously refused to force his resignation, among other reasons, on the score of his being a Jew.

The Confederate armies had suffered a serious defeat with the fall of Fort Donaldson at the hands of General Grant. The popular hero of the South, Gen. Albert Sidney Johnson, was killed. A scapegoat had to be found. They seized upon Judah P. Benjamin. Jefferson Davis, with rarest courage, refused to dispense with the services of Judah P. Benjamin. He accepted his resignation as Secretary of War and, despite public clamor, advanced him to the position of Secretary of State. His confidence in Benjamin, in the light of subsequent developments, was amply justified. It required, however, a tremendous fearlessness to withstand popular prejudice. This is the courage we expect of you after graduation when you commence your careers.

You must be thorough. You must be courageous. You cannot be selfish.

Aboriginal man fought nature. Not being satisfied with this conquest he turned to fight other men. His greed and selfishness wanted everything in sight. In this civilized age he has not yet learned to live and let live. He is a selfish, acquisitive creature who must rule or ruin. Now, more than ever, in the era of the new deal, he must learn to be his brother's keeper. Until the Nation acquires this knowledge and becomes selfless, the weak will still be stricken down and the new deal shall have been for naught. It is logical to suppose that we are in this economic mess because the past generation was selfish and greedy. It exploited and nearly exhausted many of our natural resources with little thought for the future. With reckless disregard for the individual, science substituted machinery. Technological displacement of laborers by machinery has caused untold misery and has resulted in the amassing of great wealth for the favored few.

Verily, we must agree with Robert Burns when he says, "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn."

Never more shall we permit, and you, the future leaders of the country must help in this regard, a Carnegie, or a Frick, or a Rockefeller, to selfishly and greedily acquire their millions through the sufferings of countless individuals. Theirs was selfishness on a grade scale. The Carnegie libraries cannot wipe out the stigma. The Rockefeller benefactions cannot make amends for the havoc wrought. It reminds one of a man condemned for the murder of his mother and father and who asks for clemency on the ground that he is an orphan.

Mr. Wiggin, of the Chase National Bank, yielded to the smug ethics of the age of greed. We read that while with his right hand, in 1929, he was ostensibly stabilizing the stock market, with his left he was authorizing his private corporation to make millions by selling short the stock of his own bank. In the following years, when the salaries of his employees were being cut, and the equity of his stockholders depreciated, Mr. Wiggin accepted a princely salary from his bank. When he retired, rich in a land of suffering, he accepted, in spite of his poor management, an annual pension of $100,000. An outraged nation forced him to let this go. Imagine, however, the brazen effrontery. That shall never happen again.

Never more shall you permit a Mitchell to escape payment of just income taxes by deceitful and self-serving means. Happily, Insull will soon be brought to book. Never more shall you permit a Clarence Dillon or a J. P. Morgan to speculate ruthlessly with other people's money. These men swept aside all honor and decency to satisfy their own cupidity. They ruled like the kings of old. Some of them have abdicated. A number yet remain. It is for you to cause their thrones to totter. It is well to recall what Roosevelt said in his inaugural address, concerning the practices of these unscrupulous men: "Money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men." Roosevelt has started to curb the money oligarchy of the Nation.

We must help him crush and destroy it utterly. We have passed banking-reform bills, bank-deposit guaranties, Federal securities acts, and have recently demonetized the dollar. Much remains to be accomplished in order to destroy this oligarchy and make the new deal a reality—to make the Nation less selfish and more selfless. We must license the New York Stock Exchange, the New York Curb Exchange, and all other commodity exchanges. We must prevent the operation of nefarious pools and predatory short selling and other objectionable practices, so as to put the last nail in the coffin of the wizards of high finance. A thoroughly aroused public opinion is necessary for this. We look to you—courageous, selfless, and thorough—to help in this fight.

Walter Lippmann recently stated: "There is no mistaking the conclusion that we are in the midst of one of the great revolutionary periods of history and that upon our generation and its successors the task is imposed of discovering and establishing a multitude of new relationships among the peoples of this planet."

We look to you, the future leaders of the race, to help us tide over this revolutionary period.

There is imposed upon you the duty of discovery and working out these new relationships.

We must help the Nation reaffirm the Golden Rule and reorganize our economic life on an equitable basis. We must redistribute supply to equal demand and espouse a social responsibility side by side with a healthy self-interest. Let there be a truce to greed. To you the Nation in part looks for leadership in the rescue, in the recovery, in the new deal.

MONEY AND THE CONTROL THEREOF

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, Will Rogers has said that there are two kinds of crazy people, those locked up in asylums and those still at large who think they have solved the money question. I have no desire to be included in the latter class. However, I cannot refrain from discussing this important question which is uppermost in the minds of those giving thought to our present economic difficulties. We, of the West, do have definite convictions on this subject. On behalf of the producing citizens of Oregon, whom I represent in this Congress, I feel it my privilege and duty to make a few observations upon money and the control thereof.

USE OF METAL AS MONEY

Centuries upon centuries ago, when our ancestors were taking their first steps in civilization, all trading or exchange of property must have been by barter: a cow exchanged for a horse, a sheep for a piece of woven goods. Slowly, but surely, our ancestors came to recognize various different articles as mediums of exchange between different commodities traded. Almost everything has been used for money: cattle, sheep, wampum, gold, silver, and iron.

Somewhere back in the mystic past, some enterprising chap commenced to use gold as the measurment for articles traded, those pieces of rock which he found in the river beds and the mountain ledges. We have today in our museums gold and silver coins out of Western Asia that were stamped fully 3,000 years ago. I do not believe that gold and silver were placed in the earth, by the ruler of the universe, for the sole purpose of being used as money by mankind. It just happened that way. These metals were scarce, hard to find, and limited in quantity. They could be easily divided, had a peculiar luster, and have been precious through all the ages. Stamps of the governments of the world give value to gold. It is the refusal of that stamp to silver that has caused its decline in value, when measured in gold. The so-called "intrinsic value" is a myth, a misnomer. We might say wheat has an intrinsic value, or value within itself, because it will sustain human life. Gold and silver will not so sustain life until exchanged for those things that a man must consume in order to live. The worship of gold and silver is a fetish from savage days. Humankind only slowly gives up traditions and ancient customs. For this generation, and perhaps for several generations yet to come, gold will continue to be the measuring stick in the world's trading centers: the article that will now, and probably for generations, continue to settle trade balances between nations.

All of the monetary gold in the world could be put into a 36-foot cube. It could all be put into the hold of an ocean-going ship, and then form only a part of the cargo. The total of all the gold in the world amounts to only about twelve billions, weighing about 24,000 tons. Suppose it were sunk in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, and also all of the silver, would that mean the end of all things? I ask my gold friends to conceive a world in that condition. Does that mean the crops would not grow? No more grass? Would that cause trade to cease and civilization to break? What nonsense? But, to hear some of the money experts talk in this House, you would conclude at once that the rains would cease to fall, and the crops would fail to grow and ripen and men would revert to savagery if anything happened to the present money system. I cannot see nor find anything sacred or absolutely necessary in metallic money, still I recognize, as you must, that the gold ounce is today and has for centuries been the yardstick that measures value in the world trade centers. It is not the American dollar, the English sovereign, nor the French franc, but the gold ounce which is the world's yardstick.

Civilization has not advanced in a steady climb from the caves to the present wonderful, but really only half-bright day. The story of man tells us that highly civilized nations have given way to advancing savage hordes. It would seem that, after all our marvelous achievements in the arts and in science, we ought to be able to devise some sensible medium of exchange, so people and nations could more easily exchange commodities without dependence on any metal. That advance certainly lies in the future.

MONEY AND CIVILIZATION

Many causes have been given by different historians as the reason for the fall of Rome in 476 A.D. Whether it was one cause or the combination of a dozen that brought that most famous civilization of the ancient world down to the dust need not be disoussed, but one observation I would make today. I would recall to your minds that when the savage northern tribes overcame Rome and murdered her senators within their marble halls there was less than 10 percent of the amount of gold and silver in Rome than was there 400 years earlier in the days of the Caesars. The mines had failed to yield, trading had ceased, the Dark Ages had begun. Money, metallic money, had largely disappeared.

When the bold, hardy adventurers of western Europe discovered and distributed the immense accumulations of gold and silver from Mexico and Peru they increased the quantity of metallic money 20 times; they gave to the world a new impetus in trade which increased by leaps and bounds. Man shook off the lethargy of a thousand years, and a modern world was born amid a flood of gold and silver.

When Marshall discovered the yellow rocks in Sutter's millrace in California, in '49, he unknowingly gave the world a forward push into heretofore untrodden ways of greatness and conquest over nature.

Whenever you look through the dusty books and read of the doings of man you will find that, after a marked increase in the world's stock of gold and silver, conditions have vastly improved. For many years now gold and silver have not been coming from the mines in sufficient quantities to keep up with the demands. The arts and sciences constantly take a large percentage of the world's output, and there have been no new large recent discoveries like California, the Rand, and Klondike.

THE GOLD STANDARD

Two Nations, the United States and France, have two thirds of the world's known monetary gold. Every nation is freezing with a deathlike grip to the gold it controls. The United States possesses today the largest stock of gold ever accumulated at any time by any nation in human history. A few days ago I saw in New York tons of gold in bars and bags buried in the vaults of the Federal Reserve bank, 45 feet beneath the sea level. It is truly "sterilized", seemingly as useless as when buried in the mountain ledges. Almost 40 percent of the world's monetary supply of gold is in the United States.

Were we on the gold standard today, freely redeeming our currency in gold, our storehouse of yellow metal, more than 9,000 tons, would vanish like a morning mist before the July sun.

We did not retire from the gold standard voluntarily, we were forced off. Had not Roosevelt acted swiftly and firmly when he took the oath of office on the 4th of March 1933, all of the gold in the country would have disappeared into hiding places. The country had completely lost confidence. We had, at that time, almost $58,000,000,000 of bank deposits, and most depositors wanted gold to bury in safety deposit boxes, ship to Europe, or hide in some old mattress. We then had, in metal money, less than 8 percent of the total of bank deposits which were, supposedly, payable in gold. We should pause to consider the startling position we were in so far as credit was concerned. The Nation's business, in its most prosperous period, was conducted through credit and not with metallic money. The great pyramid of credit on such a small money base was one of the causes of our financial break. In the future, we may see the same type of credit system built up without the necessity for a metal base—and, that, perhaps, is our distant goal.

I repeat, going off the gold basis was not a matter of choice, as our monetary system is now organized. It could not possibly have been avoided. We cannot return to the single gold standard with our great volume of business. That kind of deflation would ruin those few solvent institutions and people still remaining. The adherents to the gold standard say we have simply lost confidence. Indeed, we have, and it is not going to be restored by further deflation. The fifty-eight billions we recently had in checking accounts in this country have been decreased about one third. The velocity of trade has been reduced more than one half.

QUANTITATIVE THEORY OF MONEY

By the "quantitative theory" we mean that commodity prices are regulated by the quantity of money. This theory is correct when all the factors are considered, namely, the gold, the silver, the currency in circulation, the substitutes for currency, like checking accounts and other credits, and also the velocity or speed of trading or turnover.

It requires no great amount of reasoning to prove to an unprejudiced mind that if the quantity of gold basic money were now doubled the prices of commodities would advance, unless hindered by an extraordinary surplus of any particular commodity. Cut the quantity of gold in half and prices would shrink. The same law holds good in money metal that all admit holds good in wheat. If the quantity of wheat were to shrink one half this year, then the price would rapidly advance. If the fields were to double their yield, then the price, when measured in gold, would shrink.

What we need today is gold coming from the mines in quantity and then a fair distribution thereof among nations and people. We cannot have world prosperity and world trade when the gold supply is hoarded by a few nations or a few people. What the United States, what the world needs is more money—more of the medium of exchange that can be used to promote trade and business. Higher prices for agricultural commodities must be brought about. It is this higher price for commodities in the world's markets that we need and must have. World prices, outside of national borders, are not affected by checking accounts nor by issues of currency. This has been proven beyond doubt in Russia and Germany. When those countries issued untold billions of marks and rubles, their issues of paper money did not in the least affect the prices of commodities in the world's markets, though startling changes took place internally. For instance, a colleague told me that his brother, farming the ancestral acres in Germany, had struggled for years under a mortgage of 15,000 marks. During the inflation period he paid off this mortgage by the sale of one fat heifer, but the heifer had no such unusual exchange value outside of Germany.

Prosperity through higher prices for agricultural commodities assumes a greater purchasing power among the employees of industry, and it assumes employment of all workers at decent living wages. Prosperity cannot come to one group or class. Where and when Government money is being freely spent in relief or public works, conditions have improved; but the disease that is eating at the very vitals of this Nation has not disappeared. Legislation of the Seventy-third Congress has been largely palliative. It is like rubbing a little salve on a desperately infected wound. We must not deceive ourselves by using the term "depression" and assuming that conditions will gradually return to the old status. This is not a temporary depression. It is a world crisis and a change to which we must adjust ourselves. It is shaking the very foundations of our economic life. We are fast drifting into general bankruptcy and financial chaos.

CONTROLLED EXPANSION OR REPUDIATION?

It is either cheaper money with higher wheat, corn, cattle, butter, or else repudiation of the mountain of debts of the individuals, municipalities, States, and nations. You, bondholders of the Atlantic border, who largely control legislation through your bankers, can take your choice between controlled expansion of the currency or repudiation. Three thousand municipalities, along with many States of this country, have defaulted on interest or principal, or rather find themselves unable to pay. What buyers of municipal securities could have realized a few short years ago that our Congress would pass legislation regulating municipal bankruptcies?

Millions of farmers and business men are nearing the danger line of repudiation. The present situation is just a forecast of what the future has in store. Do not dream for one single minute that the danger has passed. It is estimated that there are today more than 10,000,000 unemployed. With their dependents, almost one third of the population is on charity, and not consuming normally.

THE OUNCE OF GOLD

I heard an eloquent Congressman from Texas say a few days ago in this House that the United States could safely issue $15,000,000,000 additional currency and it would be sufciently backed up by the required 40 percent of gold in the Federal Reserve bank and owned by the Government. If this currency were issued tomorrow and Government interest-bearing bonds to that amount retired, it would save annually nearly a half billion in interest, and internal business activity would take on new life. That currency would be better than the bonds because it would have the 40 percent gold backing. Both bonds and currency rest on the credit and vitality of this Government. However, that great issue of currency, while it would increase prices in this country and stimulate trade and be beneficial, would not raise the prices of exportable surpluses nor would the prices of wheat and wool in Liverpool advance; nor would the prices of shoes and other manufactured goods in South America be raised.

It is the world's commodity price level that must be advanced. It is futile to try to raise it by credit expansion.

I am told, on high authority, that one of the greatest disappointments to the officials of the Treasury Department is the fact that the deflation of the gold dollar to 59 cents has not noticeably affected commodity prices. The President himself made that admission a few days ago. Does anybody think in America today that France and England care how many grains of gold we call one dollar? Neither do we care how many grains of gold those countries put into their sovereigns and francs. The gold ounce is the yardstick in the world's marts of trade. Many people foolishly believe that cutting down the grains in the American dollar was equivalent to doubling the amount of gold. They lose sight of the fact that balances between nations are not settled by dollars and marks, but by weight of gold. The gold ounce is still the standard for measuring values and will still remain so, as far as we can now see, for generations.

Could the President have doubled the gold of the world prices would have moved up rapidly. He did improve conditions and stimulate mining by advancing the price of gold to $35 an ounce, paid in American dollars.

The gold standard is of English origin. That country, being an industrial nation, wanted low prices for food and raw materials. When the gold standard depressed world prices, so much the better for England, which was a buyer. The world a few years ago had to have England's manufactured goods. Disraeli, the wise English statesman, said:

It is the greatest delusion of history to attribute the commercial preponderance and prosperity of England to the gold standard.

David Hume, historian, wrote:

It is certain that since the discovery of the mines in America industry has increased in all nations, which may be ascribed to the increase in gold and silver.

Queer as it may seem, with the present psychology of the world, we are all largely dependent upon the yields of gold and silver. Metal money still represents and measures value in the world's markets.

SILVER MONEY NECESSARY

What has so depressed world prices for commodities? Is it not primarily the shortage of gold, which is not sufficient to sustain the commercial and credit needs of the world? Secondarily, the cause may be ascribed to the low price of silver when measured in gold. This prevents silver-using countries from buying products from gold-using countries. Silver has not fallen when measured by commodity prices, but gold has increased in value as a result of legislation. Laws can set in motion economic forces which affect values.

That is precisely what deliberate demonetization of silver has done in the United States. Gold and silver were freely coined at our mints from 1792 to 1873, for 81 years, at a ratio of 15 to 1, or 16 to 1. These ratios were used because the metals have come from the earth in about that proportion. By the term "ratio of 16 to 1" we mean that 1 ounce of gold has the same value or debt-paying ability as 16 ounces of silver. During the 81 years of bimetallism we had no such currency troubles as we have had during the last 60 years. The demonetization of silver was a deliberate act by the privileged and powerful classes to increase the values of their holdings.

There is no great amount of silver in the world. During the World War England had to have 200,000,000 ounces of silver for India. It could be obtained only in Washington from the United States Treasury. Silver is mainly produced as a byproduct. In 1920 it sold at $1.38 per ounce. No great quantity came forth. It is now proposed to establish a value of $1.29 an ounce, or 16 to 1, in relation to gold. Silver should be nationalized, the same as gold has been, thus vesting in the government the title to all monetary silver to be purchased at a price not exceeding 50 cents an ounce, curbing speculation and giving the profit to the Government.

Two thirds of the people of this world use silver as their basic money. On the Atlantic coast we rarely see a silver dollar; the prevailing small currency is a paper dollar, redeemable in one silver dollar, said to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

If an unlimited demand is created for an article at a certain price, any place in the world, that article will bring that price, less the cost of taking the article to that place.

I believe this Government should make all the profit honestly possible by reestablishing the double standard of money, or bimetallism; therefore, I think the Government should, at once, purchase all silver offered for sale and continue buying until the ratio with gold is 16 to 1. When the price of silver reaches that ratio, then freely offer to coin, or deposit in the Treasury, all gold and silver offered. If deposited, then issue paper currency against the deposit and give it to those who bring the metals to the mints. By "free coinage" is meant that there should be no limit on the amount that may be brought to the mints for coinage. Why should the Government buy either gold or silver after the ratio is established? Open the mints as they were open from 1792 to 1873 to all owners of gold and silver to have the metals tested for weight and fineness. By such action world commodity prices would advance at once. Millions would find jobs at living wages.

PAPER CURRENCY

I hold in my hand a $5 bill, issued by the Federal Reserve Bank in New York. It was issued, it says, in the series of 1929, and it is stated on the face that it is "national currency secured by United States bonds deposited with the Treasury of the United States of America"; and then, in smaller type, "or by like deposits of other securities." What does that mean? If it means anything, it means that back of this $5 bill are $5 worth of bonds issued or debts incurred by the United States, or "other securities." I wonder if "other securities" could possibly mean bonds from busted South American countries? "Other securities"—and that is what it says on the face of the $5 bill—might mean any sort of cats and dogs. Still this $5 bill floats freely in the Capital of the Nation. With millions of this kind of money floating in the land, no one has the right to yell his head off about printing-press money. We have it today, but not in sufficient quantities and not sufficiently evenly distributed to give us the prosperity we should have.

How clearly the curious use of money is illustrated by the story, current last year, of a stranger who deposited a $100 bill with the clerk of a hotel. The clerk paid it out on a butcher bill. It traveled around the town paying "butcher, baker, and candlestick maker" all day and was returned to the hotel at night for payment of a bill. The stranger that night asked for his $100 bill and luckily for the clerk it was in the cash drawer when called for. The stranger then calmly lit his cigar with the money, remarking to the astonished clerk that it was just counterfeit. It had, however, paid several debts during the day. What is money? What is value?

BIMETALLISM

The Government is now paying in Government interest-bearing bonds $35 an ounce for gold. Why? That gold is simply buried in the vaults, perhaps 45 feet beneath the ocean wave. No reason on earth except fear. The bankers fear they cannot retain their great privileges should we keep our mints open to the free coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. For convenience of users, the gold and silver is stored in vaults, and currency issued against it. Why not give the currency to those who bring the metals? You wonder, perhaps, why it is not done? I think it is because those who control affairs here, I mean the banking group of the Atlantic border, fear that they would not then control the medium of exchange as they do now, and by controlling that medium of exchange they control the fate of the world.

Where is the gold now? If you have any gold in your possession you are breaking the law. If you dare to ship any out of the United States the strong arm of the Government will take hold of you at once. Do not forget that, with free coinage, there will be no cheaper money. An unlimited market at a fixed ratio will prevent fluctuation in value. I cannot agree with those who want to buy silver and issue currency against it, and then redeem the currency so issued at the bullion price of silver as measured in gold. As I said at the beginning of this address, there is no good, sound, sensible reason why the price of wheat, wool, and cattle in Oregon should be influenced by the quantity of the gold and silver that yearly comes from the earth. However, we should never forget that the love of the metals has been for generations ground into our very natures. Human nature cannot be changed in a minute. We have to deal with fixed traditions of mankind. I firmly believe the time will come when the metal base for currency will be abandoned. Silver is the only instrument available, other than gold, to which legal fiat can be applied, as it is to gold.

A large increase of metallic reserves is essential as long as we live under our present psychology. China, India, and the United States have together two thirds of all the silver used as money.

GOLD AND SILVER BOTH NECESSARY

There should be no dispute between the gold men and silver men. Gold men should welcome us, those who believe in restoring silver, the bimetallists, to help in the fight against unlimited paper expansion. The paper standard is new. During most of the world's history we have had only gold and silver as the medium of exchange.

Opening our mints to free coinage of silver means doubling the metal money of the world at once; it will have the same effect as if there could be found and thrown into circulation 24,000 tons of gold. Free coinage of silver will not prove a panacea for all the dangers that hang over our civilization but it will double the metal base of the world, and will materially increase the price level of the world's commodities. It will insure the payment of many an obligation that is sure to be repudiated under present conditions.

I hear someone refer to "Gresham's law", that old English statement that cheaper money will drive out at once the dearer money. They fear gold will disappear and we will be on a silver base. Too bad. What are we on now? A fiat base, the credit of the Government, that is all. We refuse to redeem in gold. It is a crime to have gold in your possession to the amount of $100.

In this House we hear much about sound money. Our President, in defining this term, said, "A dollar which will not change its purchasing and debt-paying power during the succeeding generations." How are we going to establish such a yardstick? What the President means is a yardstick stable in the terms of goods and acceptable in the world's trade. Gold is the safest store of value ever known. It is not, however, and never has been, stable in terms of goods.

TRADING WITH SILVER NATIONS

In the Pacific Northwest we raise a large quantity of wheat that must be exported. Its former market was northwest Europe, where for half a century or more it found a ready sale. The prosperity of our beautiful country rests upon the number of ounces of gold which can be obtained for a cargo of that wheat in Liverpool. Full well do we know that this Government cannot continue through a long series of years to bolster the price of wheat by the so-called "voluntary allotment plan" and by shipping the surplus out of our country at a governmental financial loss of millions. What will bring prosperity to my State is for a cargo of wheat to sell in Liverpool for double the number of ounces of gold that it does now. That end can be reached by increasing the quantity of metal money. If the export surplus wheat cannot be traded for gold, if the mines refuse to yield fast enough, and scientists have not yet learned to extract it from the ocean, then let us add silver to the gold, thereby doubling the quantity of metal money.

But I hear someone say silver is not equal to gold. Surely it is not. But it will answer the same use and the same purpose and the relation or ratio is easily established. Make it possible for the man selling that cargo of Oregon wheat in Liverpool to take in exchange a certain number of ounces of either silver or gold. The exporter can bring those ounces of precious metal back to the United States, where they will be interchangeable at a fixed ratio. That will bring prosperity to the State of my adoption, which I am honored to represent on this floor. Our Western Conference of Governors has officially taken the stand for silver. Congress does have under the Constitution the right to "coin money and regulate the value thereof." That power should not be delegated to any man or group of men. We could by legislative act rule that 5 grains of gold will be $1. It will not affect the Liverpool price of wheat any more than the President's Executive order affected that price when he fixed the dollar at 59.06 cents.

The Dies bill, which passed the House, is not a money bill. It is an agricultural bill. It will aid the farmer to find a market for the exportable surplus by making it possible for the foreign purchasers to pay in silver at a value of 25 percent over the world price of that metal. Then that bullion silver may be deposited with the United States Treasury and paper currency issued against it at a value of $1.29 an ounce.

Inflation is the bugaboo that scares so many. When I was a small boy, many preachers thought it necessary to keep before the people the horrors of hell in order to make them behave. So are our banker friends constantly reminding us of their insurance policies and what might happen to them, saying "They will not buy so much in the days of higher prices; insurance policies will not be as valuable." Inflation is warned against as the darkest pit into which we could possibly fall.

FEAR OF INFLATION

No other argument is more frequently used, on this floor, against silver than this one. "If you decrease the value of money, how about the wage earner? What about the investments and income of the great foundations and of the bond holder? His real income will be cut down as much as your income is increased", they say. Then students often say to me, "Inflation will not help your kind. You will get more for your wheat and cattle, but everything you buy will be correspondingly higher." They all forget that interest and taxes, debts, are large items. They will not advance because of more money. Taxes may, after a time. Before then, the bond clipper and wage earner and insurance policy holder are sure to have lost all they have had. The way we are now going, repudiation and bankruptcy stare us in the face. It is either a higher price level or a disaster ahead which will be far worse than anything we have yet seen.

In the home of an official in Washington I was recently shown a piece of German currency of the inflation period. It called for a billion marks. My brilliant friend said, "That is just what you are trying to bring on in this country, Governor." No intelligent and honest man believes in uncontrolled inflation. It is only an extremely small percent of our citizens who would willingly endanger or embarrass the Government in that manner. Well do we know today that Germany deliberately and intentionally made her marks valueless by issuing billions which she never intended to redeem or pay. Millions upon millions of dollars were taken out of the United States for German marks sold here, and then deliberately Germany made that currency valueless.

We are often reminded that Lincoln issued greenbacks in the time of the Civil War. He did, to the amount of almost half a billion. In no other way could he have paid the soldiers. The Southern Confederacy issued greenbacks and thereby prolonged the war. They could not pay their soldiers in gold or silver because it was not in the land. There was nothing to do but to use their credit. Of course, their greenbacks could not be redeemed, any more than all of the debts that were accumulated in the boom period of 1929 can be paid.

We often hear the expression "not worth a continental", having reference to the old continental money issued by the revolutionary fathers in the most trying days of the revolution. The issue of that money made possible the success of the American Revolution.

OWNERSHIP OF SILVER

Bimetallists have recently been falsely accused by some Government officials and part of the press of attempting to make profit out of free silver. Bimetallism is a religion with many of the men who have been students of the history of money for years. There is scarcely a bimetallist in our land who owns or controls any quantity of silver. The only gain we seek is our part of the general prosperity that we know is sure to follow. Pass the Wheeler bill, introduced by Senator WHEELER, of Montana, S. 70, and business would take on new life, as it did when tons of gold and silver came out of Mexico and Peru. It will have the same effect as great discoveries of gold and silver have had since the dawn of history.

America is today a creditor nation of the world. Very reluctantly do we import; we desire to export in great quantity. We apparently feel that we can no longer lend money to nations and people who have so brazenly repudiated their debts. We thus occupy an impossible position. If we refuse to buy goods, how are nations to buy from us? To retreat from the world's markets is exceedingly dangerous.

THE REMEDY

I am not so foolish as to believe that all our ills can be cured by opening our mints to the free coinage of silver. While I believe that the manipulation of money has been largely the cause of our trouble, I recognize that the coming of the machines has had very much to do with the break by adding many millions to the bread lines. If you wonder what has become of our money and credit, take a trip over Washington and see the unending lines of cars, automobiles of all kinds, and then think this is only one city out of hundreds. The internal-combustion engine, the trucks, the tractors, the automobiles, and the busses have had very much to do in bringing the country to financial ruin. We cannot now give up the machinery. It is here to stay. We must adjust ourselves to its use. Machinery has been a tremendous factor in piling up the wealth of the country into a few hands.

Before there can be any revival of prosperity there must be a general redistribution of wealth by income and inheritance taxes, so all may live in decency. Our tax system must be readjusted under a plan of ability to pay, and, above all things, interest or rental on the use of money must be brought down to a just and reasonable amount, not greater than the annual increase of wealth, about 2 percent.

Ruined by greed and privilege with its attendant political corruption, we seek relief from unbearable conditions. We have experimented for over 4 years. A remedy lies at hand, a remedy that we can use, a remedy that conforms to tradition, a remedy that conforms to history, a remedy that can be easily understood, and that is the free and unlimited coinage of silver by the United States at a ratio of not greater in debt-paying power than 16 to 1.

RECKLESS, UNTRUTHFUL PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY ASPIRANTS FOR CONGRESS ARE ANSWERED BRIEFLY BECAUSE THE PUBLIC SHOULD KNOW THE TRUE RECORD

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak on a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. I am entitled to an hour as a matter of personal privilege, but will take only a limited time to discuss a matter that may affect any Member. In all the time I have been a Member of the House, I have never had occasion to rise to a question of personal privilege to reply to statements made back in my State which are dishonest and unfair in regard to any record vote cast by me in the House. I voted against the Philippine oil proposition on the tax bill in committee and in the House, and, as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER], who offered the amendment, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], chairman, and every member of the committee knows, I took active part in that debate. It has been said in my district, a dairy district, by ignorant or unscrupulous speakers, that I supported the Philippine oil proposition, and it has been published in a number of newspapers down as far as Madison, the State capital, where I was defended by the press. That attracted my attention to the canard.

Mr. Speaker, I rarely respond to unjust and unprovoked attacks from candidates looking for the office I hold. In such cases the purpose and animus by rival candidates is so well known that constituents are expected to measure political promises, pledges, and criticisms at their true value. For that reason I have made no answer or rejoinder to false statements of such candidates ordinarily deserving reply, but a leading editorial justly criticizing one of these political critics causes me to insert in the RECORD a letter of thanks received and a brief correction of repeated false statements made by this same critic. It is included in a letter of reply I sent the editor who kindly defended me from the false charge:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 17, 1934.

Hon. WILLIAM T. EVJUE,
Publisher Capital Times, Madison, Wis.

DEAR MR. EVJUE: Thanks for vigorous defense of my record in the leading Times editorial of the 14th instant, with your exposé of record of Assemblyman Donley, an announced Democratic candidate for Congress.

The absurdity of his charges as to my record on Philippine coconut oil is in its misstatement of fact inexcusable under the circumstances. Every Member of Congress knows that I supported Governor SHALLENBERGER's oil-tax amendment in our committee to keep out hundreds of millions of pounds of imported oils and other substitutes that affected the dairymen of Wisconsin and other States. Congressman SHALLENBERGER is a Democratic leader of the House, with a Nation-wide reputation for honesty and ability, and when he heard of false statements made by Mr. Donley through the press as to my votes and record, he sent me the following letter, which speaks for itself:

"DEAR CONGRESSMAN FREAR: I wish to thank you on behalf of every dairy farmer in this country for your support in our committee and the House of my amendment shutting out foreign oils, now reaching over 600,000,000 pounds annually. Every vote you cast was against these oil imports and for the farmer.

"Sincerely yours,

"A. C. SHALLENBERGER."

Chairman DOUGHTON, of the Ways and Means Committee, just reminded me he would also say that every member of the committee knew of my active support of the Shallenberger amendment as well as of the tax bill.

Leading farm representatives write me in reference to Mr. Donley, a candidate and critic, saying that three Farmer Union county conventions in the district invited him to come and defend his assembly record of violation of promises to farmers, but that he refused to appear. Possibly more important, the Assembly Journal of January 23, 1934, discloses that this same Donley voted against Resolution 64 A, memorializing Congress to give the American people a right to vote on war before Congress declares war. That right, which he opposed, would prevent needless wars. I make no charges and rarely indulge in personalities in campaigns or at other times. If false in one case, it should discredit this witness thereafter.

I thank you, first, for exposing the record of this critic and, second, to say his criticisms were both untrue and without possible excuse.

Sincerely,

JAMES A. FREAR.

Mr. Speaker, every man has a right to be a candidate for any office. No criticism has ever been made by me of anyone from that fact. Many candidates seek to disparage any official whom they wish to succeed. That is their only method of campaigning and practice, ordinarily condemned by every reasonable, thinking person. Records and responsibility, not abuse, is the test of qualifications by which candidates should be measured.

I have no purpose to enter into a bitter campaign for the honorable place I hold, because my record is well known and constituents do not need be told. Regular endorsement by reelections indicates conscientious performance of duties has been given. If other candidates believe differently, the people, who are not easily misled, always decide the issue.

Those who have known my record as assemblyman, State senator, secretary of state, and Representative will not believe the barrage of falsehoods and misstatements which are beginning to appear from men who desire to hold the position I now occupy.

From the days when I pressed for passage the first Statewide primary bill in Wisconsin to the long list of Federal laws since passed the work has been constructive and valuable to the people. Representing agriculture consistently, I have ever sought correctly to represent and give helpful advice and legislation to dairy farmers, to labor, and all others I represent.

Forward progressive laws urged by the President for like reason have been supported. No political differences in Congress are to be found in such service. Frequent conferences here by men before the general relief commissions, together with letters, telegrams of advice to every county on drought, floods, and general-relief measures, have been sent to save delay and needless suffering.

Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for generous words received in the past and offer this brief statement to say that no act or purpose, to my knowledge, has ever run counter to the progressive legislative work we are advancing necessary to aid a distressed public.

Without control of any press or news publications, but through courtesy of a few papers, I have endeavored to keep constituents advised of congressional proceedings from the standpoint of a participant and not from that of critics who may be prejudiced because of their own candidacies.

Because of heavy printing expense, I am not sending speeches made on a variety of subjects of public welfare in the House, but include herewith a statement prepared by others cognizant of the facts affecting several measures sent to a limited number to explain the status of the Frazier bill, in which many thousands are interested; it also gives information on other matters of importance.

In answer to inquiries as to the status of the Farmers' Union Frazier bill, that primarily seeks to grant needed relief to farm debtors, and other queries, this brief statement is made:

Of 145 names required to sign Congressman LEMKE's petition to discharge the committee from control of the Frazier bill, 12 names were withdrawn by request of Democratic leaders, according to Mr. LEMKE. If passed by the House, he says it will pass the Senate, and assurances given him were that the President would sign the bill. I was one of the early signers and supporters of the Frazier bill back in 1932. A friend of both Senator FRAZIER and Congressman LEMKE, I know of its great need. I quote from the statement so prepared by others:

Approval of Congressman FREAR's record is found in strong letters. Senator FRAZIER said under date of June 23, 1932: "You have proven yourself a real representative of the people. I especially appreciate your fight in behalf of the farmers and labor. You are to be congratulated on your success in helping to defeat the sales tax, which was so strongly advocated by the great financial interests; also by the fearless fight you have made toward reducing Federal expenditures in general. * * * The progressive voters of your State and Nation appreciate the good work you have done. Wishing you success in your coming primary and election, I am,

"Yours truly,

"LYNN J. FRAZIER."
(Author of Frazier bill.)

John A. Simpson, former president of the National Farmers Union, June 11, 1932, writes, "Dear Mr. FREAR: As the end of this session of Congress approaches, I want to thank you for the assistance you have given the measures introduced in the House and endorsed by the National Farmers Union. I have watched your record in Congress for nearly 20 years. I assure you that I approve of practically every position that you have taken on public questions, including war times, during that 20 years. I sincerely hope you will be successful in your campaigns, both in the primaries and general election, and thus the farmers have your services in Congress another 2 years. Yours very truly, John A. Simpson, president."

These two leading friends of the American farmer helped roll up 36,000 votes for your Congressman over that cast for President Hoover last election because of allegiance to the farmers and workers of our State.

Assistant Secretary of Labor McGrady writes: "While the press has stated that Congressman FREAR, of Wisconsin, has saved the people more than $500,000,000 during recent years, I feel this estimate is conservative. Your efforts in behalf of the people of the country have well merited the title of 'All-American Congressman', and I sincerely trust sometime I will have opportunity of telling the people of Wisconsin of your devotion in behalf of the workers of the United States. Sincerely yours, Edward F. McGrady, Assistant Secretary of Labor."

Federal Indian Commissioner Collier writes: "Since 1926 Congressman FREAR has been the best and most effective friend of the Indians in Congress. No man in or out of Congress has done as much for them."

Governor Pinchot (Pennsylvania), Cleveland speech, April 2, 1932: "Congressman FREAR is one of the ablest fighters for the square deal and one of the boldest and most persistent."

"Dear colleague, you are not afraid to fight, and you know how to fight. You were a vital factor in saving the Government close to $500,000,000. I know how important and valuable your aid was, and so did President Coolidge." (W. F. Kopp, former chairman Labor Committee, Feb. 17, 1933.)

"I know what a brave and single-handed fight you made for years for justice for the Indians." (Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, Apr. 22, 1933.)

"Mr. President, the sales tax was practically defeated in the House largely under the leadership of a Member of Congress from Wisconsin, Representative FREAR." (Senator La Follette, Sr., in Senate debate.)

"I congratulate you progressives * * * There was removed from the Ways and Means Committee (later returned) Mr. FREAR, the biggest and bravest of them all. You dared not face in committee * * * or on this floor the arguments he could present." (Record of debate, Dec. 16, 1925, Mr. RAINEY (now Speaker of the House).)

United States Senator NYE won a great victory in the Senate to investigate activities of war-munition makers and paid high compliment to your Congressman when he introduced Mr. FREAR'S resolution on right to vote by the people before any foreign war is declared, thus insuring its consideration by the Senate. John Simpson wrote, February 4, shortly before his death, "I heartily approve of your letter to the President, calling his attention to the resolution you had introduced on war." Senator CAPPER, farm publisher, wrote, "Your address is the strongest argument in favor of this step (a war vote by the people) I have ever read." Governor Scheideman, Wisconsin, writes, "I am in full accord with the war resolution that you introduced in Congress." Jane Addams, a world-peace leader, writes, "Congratulations on the fine position you have taken on war."

Mr. Speaker, I do not claim to deserve all these good words, but they seem useful in combating criticisms that come from candidate critics. As stated at the outset I do not ordinarily pay attention to false statements of candidates made for the purpose of advancing their candidacy for office, but no man of intelligence can believe the many letters from which the above are quoted would be given to one entirely undeserving.

Men high in the American Congress and in public life rarely give voice to tributes I have quoted. If again a candidate, which is for the future to determine, it would be based on the faith that constituents are not easily misled nor affected by party lines when determining records and performance of their officials in positions of public trust. This is not affected by unfulfilled promises nor by claims of performances not vouched for by any man of public prominence. No one man materially changes the activities of Congress. To serve one's constituents faithfully and honestly is a record, however, well worth having. That is vouched for by a group of strong voluntary tributes quoted by those who know the record.

Members of Congress are flooded with petitions, resolutions, and correspondence on every conceivable subject, including hundreds—yes, thousands—of bills and resolutions out of more than 20,000 introduced. Sometimes these communications come from organized propaganda and often are inspired by proponents of a particular bill. A few days ago I received one petition signed by 300 names or more urging support of a bill affecting the long-and-short railway haul. It has always had my support, but with committee and subcommittee hearings and other legislative duties I was in a quandary how to reach the petitioners. The signed pages were soiled and begrimed by hands that work. They came from the railway-car shops in my home city. They came from men who had known me since the days when as a boy I worked in the car shops. Men who were anxious to have their townsmen and Representative know their wishes. For that reason I use this means of advising them that my views are the same as theirs on the bill and always have been.

Mr. Speaker, may I be pardoned for recalling an incident of long ago, when as a youth with a similar soiled petition of several hundred names I stood in the Governor's office at Madison asking that "soil" be overlooked because every name was that of a workingman, and often close, personal friend. The petition asked for my appointment to fill a vacancy as district attorney of the county, and I well remember the response that such "soil" gave assurance they were good citizens as well as hard workers. Whatever the argument by petitions, about equally balanced in names, endorsing two candidates, the Governor gave me the appointment. He, too, had worked with his hands and knew the value of my endorsement.

From that service as district attorney it proved a stepping stone to the State assembly, State senate, secretary of state, and Congress, and throughout the years those friends in the original petitions, succeeded by others, were among supporters who welcomed me home each year. It may add interest to know that that Governor Upham, long retired, called on me in Washington with Major General Dunwoody, under whom I had served when Dunwoody was a lieutenant in the Signal Corps of the Army. Both were veteran soldiers and men who honored the uniform they wore.

I have always been grateful for these first petitions from railway boys and the friendship they evidenced. In the shifting course of politics it was hard for some of the friends always to evidence their loyalty by their votes but no finer, stronger, or better citizens ever lived, and when "dressed up" last fall at a reunion of railway employees held in my home city, I challenge any audience to present a better or finer appearance than the shopmen.

Railway employees have never had cause to question my record because long ago I was one of them and acquainted with conditions without argument because also based on personal experience.

When the Frazier bill was urged I supported it because I knew that indebtedness and taxes are among the farmers' greatest burdens and worries. It is hard indeed to make those without personal experience understand the necessity for a reduction of both interest rates and taxes before farmers of the North can recover from their present distress. Their tariff protection is threatened by changing currency values, and many other troubles, like drought and milksheds, disturb them which cannot be reached by legislation. Some of these I have helped meet by securing aid from the national relief agencies through Mr. Hopkins.

Nine of the 10 Congressmen from Wisconsin have signed a petition to discharge the committee having custody of the Frazier bill and thus give the House and later the Senate a chance to vote directly on the bill. Senator Frazier believes the bill can be passed by the Senate if first passed by the House, but until opposition is withdrawn it is impossible for all the delegations from the Northwest combined to drive it through the Senate. We are for it because it is just and right in principle.

In conclusion, I submit a commending brief editorial on an accompanying communication furnished the magazine the Living Church at its request, that reaches a subject close to the heart of practically every citizen, because when war comes every home is affected.

The present unprecedented depression and great suffering in the world at large and among our own people is a ligiti-mate result of the last war. For that reason I trust the extract, one of many I have discussed in and out of Congress, may be of interest.

WHO WANTS WAR?

By JAMES A. FREAR

(How many foreign wars would we have if (1) the people could vote on them and (2) profiteering could be eliminated? At least one Congressman believes these steps can and should be taken, and he discusses in this article a constitutional amendment he has proposed to that end.)

Not 1 percent of our people on the average want war and not 2 percent of our young manhood would volunteer for foreign war service if called upon today. How, then, does war come?

The following resolution, one of several I have introduced in Congress during recent years, may give answer to potent influences responsible for fomenting recent wars throughout the world. National ambitions, century-old hatred, and other influences are always found, but other active agencies in a large part explain the query, "Who wants war?" Appeals to patriotism, national defense, and kindred efforts arouse the people to approve war and are ever urged on Congress after decision is reached by the leaders responsible for war. No truer words were ever uttered than those of President Roosevelt at the Wilson dinner last December when he declared wars are not made by peoples but by leaders. A powerful and largely controlling influence for war is set forth in the recitals preceding the proposed amendment to the Constitution I have introduced during the present session which reads as follows:

"Whereas House Joint Resolution 218—to grant a pre-war plebiscite to the people, and for other purposes—was heard by the Judiciary Subcommittee, at which hearing the following responsible statement was made by witnesses:

"'The world today is spending something over $7,000,000,000 on armaments, in preparation for war, every year. * * * President Wilson, General Smuts, Lloyd George, and others who were closely associated with the drafting of the Covenant of the League had become tremendously impressed during the closing days of the great war in the very close connection between armament manufacturers and the governments of the countries in which those factories lay. This committee went into the question, and in 1921 brought in their report. Their conclusions were:

"'1. That armament firms have been active in fomenting war scares and in persuading their own countries to adopt warlike policies and to increase their armaments.

"'2. That armament firms have attempted to bribe government officials both at home and abroad.

"'3. That armament firms have disseminated false reports concerning the military and naval programs of various countries in order to stimulate armament expenditures.

"'4. That armament firms have sought to influence public opinion through the control of newspapers in their own and foreign countries'; and

"Whereas statements recently made to the United States Senate by Senators in debate tend to confirm such powers alleged to be exercised by munition makers; and

"Whereas request was made by the Judiciary Committee members at the hearing that, to enable the Government to meet its national defense plan, an amendment should properly be offered to the resolution under consideration: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"Congress shall have power to declare war only after the proposition shall have been submitted by the President to the several States and a majority of the States, at general or special elections called by the Governors thereof, within 30 days or on a day fixed by the President, shall have approved the same. This amendment shall not be construed to prevent the President from using the Army and Navy to suppress insurrections and to repel invasions.

"Whenever in his judgment war is imminent, the President shall conscript and take over for use by the Government all the public and private war properties, yards, factories, and supplies, together with men and employees necessary for their operation. No interest or profit shall be returned for use thereof by the Government to private parties in excess of 4 percent per annum, to be based upon tax values assessed the preceding year by the municipality in which the property is situated.

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons except as herein provided shall not be violated by conscription or forced military service, but, when public safety demands, Congress may provide for forced military service on the North American Continent and in no other place."

Recitals are no part of a constitutional amendment but set forth the reasons for its support. Prior to the Spanish-American and World Wars, no clearly defined responsibility for such wars was found. Destruction of the Maine was loosely charged to the Spanish Government on one hand, and false propaganda of frightful brutalities, sinking of Americans, national insults, and appeals to war fostered by profiteering munition and other financial interests swept Congress into the World War.

It is now known that recent wars have been fomented by those who profit from war. A brief recital of findings by a war commission as set forth in the foregoing resolution furnishes explanation for many wars throughout the world that have been instigated by manufacturers of war supplies. The March number of Fortune magazine, read on the floor of the Senate, contained many pages relating to munition makers in practically every large country. Their tremendous war profits were made through material furnished to friend and foe alike for blood money.

FALSE PROPAGANDA PRECIPITATES WARS

Unfounded and purposely false war propaganda precipitated this Government into recent wars. Appeals to mob psychology through the press and other propaganda pressed on Congress brought declarations of war. Not 10 percent of our people, it was stated in debates, would have voted for recent foreign wars nor would 5 percent of the 4,000,000 American youth conscripted for war have volunteered for foreign service. War propaganda knows to the full a mob psychology that reaches alike from layman to the clergy. It causes men to see red and lose all reasoning power.

When in passion the individual kills. When uncontrolled rage occurs, Congress legalizes wholesale killing by war. Fear to refuse is as potent as desire to yield. The propagandist knows this and plays on emotions and prejudices to get results. Men are boys grown older, and brass buttons, gold braid, guns, and swords appeal to nonthinking people, including youth, but machine guns, poison gas, bombs, armed tanks have relegated all these to the rear and entire companies with regiments are as easily wiped out as single individuals were killed by sharpshooters in olden days. Yet war glories will be depicted when again war propaganda fires the imagination. Trench life, war horrors, sickness, death, and futile results endangering civilization are all concealed by the leaders who decide.

Shall we confess our failure as a Government to meet the hopes and plans for this great democracy? Lawyers split hairs when interpreting the Constitution and its purposes. That task is left for others, subject to one brief observation I would make on wars. When our forefathers framed our bill of human rights, they declared life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness their goal. In every other land they saw the reigning sovereigns decide when wars should come, so they wrote specifically that Congress acting as representatives of the people, and not the President should have the war power.

During those days colonists were widely scattered, and it was impossible to get quick information or knowledge of world affairs until after long delay; in fact, the greatest battle of our second war was bitterly fought without either side knowing that a peace treaty had already been signed.

Recent history discloses that, contrary to the Constitution and its framers, every foreign war from the Mexican to the Spanish-American and European has followed a President's mandate to Congress. Even reelection of Presidents because against war have proved futile to prevent war.

Probably 99 percent of our people, the vast majority of whom want peace, are better informed on world events today than were any of the war leaders of a century ago, yet those who fight and pay are given no voice in the decision. They make Presidents, courts, and Congresses, but are helpless to preserve their own guaranteed rights of individual and national life.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT TRULY SAYS LEADERS, NOT PEOPLES, PROVOKE WARS

Congress and Presidents unitedly legislate, yet in protecting constitutional rights the courts without hesitation reverse unconstitutional law. A declaration of war once made cannot be reached by the courts. That power, if exercised, rightly belongs to the people to act in time and not to Congress, which latter body under modern custom capitulates to a President, and the President, following the example of kings of old, in his turn may be war minded or misled by a deluge of false propaganda. Truly Roosevelt says leaders, not peoples, provoke war. So let the people first speak and there will be few if any wars. The people can make Congress grant such rights of a plebiscite, thus avoiding needless wars. Will they do so?

That situation threatens and in fact confronts us again when peaceful men like ex-Secretary of War Baker with many other war experts predict another European war soon to occur and that our Government inevitably will join in that war. Not until the leaders so determine will our allies' names be definitely known to our own people who are expected to do the fighting. It is that preposterous situation I have sought to meet by a simple Constitutional provision that the people who fight and pay shall first determine on venturing into another great war.

Bear in mind that Scandinavia, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Spain, and other countries at war's threshold refuse to join in century-old conflicts that regularly embroil Europe. It is significant that peaceful America, 3,000 miles distant, was thrown into the World War, and again war experts predict our inevitable entrance into the next. Washington warned against foreign entanglements. We disregarded that warning and the natural results followed.

What is the remedy when leaders, not peoples, determine war? World statistics recite that 116,000,000 Christians of all denominations are found in North America, and 455,000,000 in like classifications live in Europe, yet with this tremendous influence for good in addition to millions of other beliefs and a vast army of others not church affiliated, we are unable to prevent wars. Praying to the same God for success at arms and glorying over victories that come to our arms, we show little superiority to the sensational metropolitan press that thrives on war, or those who profit through war plunder.

The same force argument that caused Cain to kill Abel has been exercised through the thousands of years that have elapsed. Nations indulge in that justification for legalized, organized killing, reaching countless millions, for war fatalties are not confined to battlefields, but encompass civilization throughout the world.

Following the World War there was promised a revolution in world sentiment against war. Its horrors were still with us. World disarmament, reduction of armaments, Leagues of Nations, World Courts, Kellogg Peace Pacts, and like peace movements were sincerely urged by peace advocates, only to face the acknowledged fact that, instead of a war to end wars, the last war and terms of settlement laid the foundation for future wars certain to come.

Fierce armament building is greater by far than ever before among European rivals and, sad to relate, Americans are among these builders. It is only one of the countless evidences of the war cyclone which threatens the world according to Baker, Hull, Simonds, and many others.

PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE OF SUBJECT DISCUSSED

My individual experience and views are unimportant in the discussion, but to explain briefly the reasons which may affect judgment I inject a personal word and say I have no pride in any family military record, although a direct ancestor was killed leading his company in the Revolution and others fought in practically every war thereafter. I have had personal experience of many years in military service of which 5 were years in the Regular Army, and a company offered for war service, with 11 years in the Wisconsin National Guard which with the Thirty-second Division experienced 13,000 casualities in the last war. This may have affected my judgment. A father and a son each served throughout the last two great wars as volunteers and the military company organized in my home town on my return from the Regular Army during the last war lost 88 men killed, or died in France, during the last war. More lives were lost by that company in one battle during the war than the entire American Navy suffered.

As a Member of the last war Congress, conscious of influences that forced us in, I have sought the only means to prevent, by an amendment to the Constitution that will grant the people the right to vote on war, to conscript war supplies when war is imminent, and refuse to conscript American boys for European wars. The President can place 20,000,000 men or more in the ranks to prevent invasion or insurrection, but only by enlistment of the church, women, and peace people who sometimes waste energies in fulminations against war will we prevent entrance into foreign wars.

Experience gives abundant proof of that fact. The average American would pledge every man and dollar in defending this country against invasion or insurrection, but in like manner oppose the Army staff's program of throwing millions of American youth into the next European or Asiatic country which our war leaders decide is to join us in another "war to end wars" or again "to make the world safe for democracy", now largely lost through many dictatorships. High-sounding purposes that catch the popular fancy will always be found, but war suffering means untold losses of life, and human misery.

In urging my resolution to permit the people to vote before any declaration of war is made by Congress, I know full well that Congress can be swept off its feet by terrific propaganda centered on men placed on naval committees and other points of war vantage to represent such interests.

That would be impossible to bring about if 30 days' deliberation was had by the American people prior to and through a plebiscite on war. Every nation is first interested in its own safety. Seizure of war supplies by the President when war is imminent will subdue war views of war profiteers, and knowledge that American boys cannot be conscripted for foreign wars will prevent cold-blooded, war-minded Army staff officers from unduly urging that means of decision. These are all human estimates that enter into the average war.

A REFERENDUM ON WAR

Who, asks Congressman FREAR in an article written at our request and published in this issue of the Living Church, wants war? The question is certainly a pertinent one, because we hear war talk on every hand. One would think, from reading the daily papers, the secular periodicals, and even the religious press, that people all over the world are only awaiting a propitious moment to unleash the dogs of war.

But who actually wants war? President Roosevelt said recently that 90 percent of the people of the world want peace and are satisfied with their present national boundaries. Of the other 10 percent it is primarily a few leaders and those who stand to gain personally by the conduct of war who really want it; the rest are mostly victims of propaganda.

But that brings us back to Congressman FREAR'S question and his answer to it. Mr. FREAR thinks it unlikely that, except in case of actual invasion or internal insurrection, the American people would of their own volition vote for war if the issue were placed squarely before them. He therefore advocates a constitutional amendment making a Nation-wide referendum obligatory before this country could engage in a foreign war or send troops overseas for war purposes. At the same time he would limit war profits to 4 percent and thus eliminate the opportunity for private interests to gain by war. But the President is given full power to use the Army and Navy and even to conscript civilians if necessary to repel invasion or suppress insurrection.

A radical proposition, you say? Well, this is a democratic country, isn't it? Then why shouldn't the people be allowed to vote on the vital question of war versus peace? Congress can be swayed by propaganda and influenced by secret lobbies. It is harder to propagandize 120,000,000 free citizens in time of peace. Moreover, when we select a Senator or Representative on some other issue—prohibition or the tariff or what not—how do we know how he is going to vote on a war resolution? Will he represent his constituents fairly? Why shouldn't his constituents be able to speak for themselves on a question of such vital importance?

We think Mr. FREAR is on the right track. Perhaps his proposed amendment can be improved in some respects. But in its essentials we believe it to be a genuinely progressive piece of legislation, in the best sense of that hackneyed term.

It is John Citizen who risks his neck in war, John Citizen who loses his job by going away to war, John Citizen whose family is left to shift for itself in his absence, and John Citizen who pays for the war. Isn't it high time that we give John Citizen the right to say whether or not he wants war before we ask him to bear all of the burdens of it?

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I was granted permission to address the House today. I ask unanimous consent to defer that privilege until Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the special order by which he was granted the right to address the House today be deferred until Tuesday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COTTON, CATTLE, AND DAIRY PRODUCTS

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 345, to provide funds to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the purposes of the acts approved April 21, 1934, and April 7, 1934, relating, respectively, to cotton and to cattle and dairy products, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up House Joint Resolution 345, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object. This is a resolution that the House ought to be told about, and I assume that there will be no objection to the chairman of the committee and myself having reasonable time to explain it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I assume that the House will not be very strict in the matter of the extension of the 5-minute rule. If we consider this in the House as if in Committee of the Whole, it automatically comes under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I wonder if we cannot have an understanding now as to the time this resolution will take. We have a large District Calendar today, and I think we ought to make some arrangement right now in the House as to general debate.

Mr. BLANTON. But there is to be no general debate upon the resolution. It will be read under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. TABER. May I ask the gentleman from New York if he is disposed to object to an extension under the 5-minute rule, so that we may properly explain the resolution?

Mr. BLACK. No.

Mr. TABER. No one intends to filibuster and take up time.

Mr. BLACK. I know the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations will not filibuster, but I have my doubts about some of the other Members. If the Appropriations Committee will stand by and fight a filibuster, all right.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. That is a rather impolitic remark for the Chairman of the Committee on Claims to make or for a member of the District Committee to make, because if any Member here objected to this present request and forced the consideration of the joint resolution into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, several hours could be taken up in general debate. A refusal to object to the present request shows a disposition not to take up time on this resolution, but to expedite it and transact business.

Mr. BLACK. Generally, Mr. Speaker, I take my parliamentary viewpoint from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], but not on this. However, I have no objection. I think the committee will be fair about it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have an opportunity to discuss the bill within reason, and I hope that the gentleman will not object to that sort of thing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. Is the resolution being read now generally to be read later for amendment? What is the practice?

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read now for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the purposes of the act entitled "An act to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes" (Public, No. 169, 73d Cong.), approved April 21, 1934, there is hereby appropriated and made available, pursuant to the authorizations contained in the said act, the funds available for carrying into effect the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, which shall be available for administrative and other expenses, and in addition thereto, the proceeds derived from the tax levied under said act of April 21, 1934, are hereby appropriated and made available for the purposes for which appropriations are authorized to be made under the provisions of section 16 (c) of said act: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall transfer to the Treasury Department, and is authorized to transfer to other agencies out of funds hereby made available for carrying out said act of April 21, 1934, such sums as are required to carry out the provisions of said act, including administrative expenses and refunds of taxes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I had hoped that the chairman of the committee would speak first, because I do not want to attempt to explain the resolution in general. There is an item in this paragraph which authorizes the employment of certain persons to do certain things under the Bankhead Cotton Act. I am not going to discuss that except to say that it calls for the employment of about 17,300 men and women, some of whom have been under employment of the A.A.A. The other part of the bill calls for employing 5,000 additional, a total for the bill of 22,300.

The rest of the bill relates to the cattle situation, and I want to talk on that subject for a few minutes. The cattle item is under the authorization of the bill which was passed here in March and April and became a law on April 7, authorizing an appropriation for the elimination of dairy and beef cattle to the extent of $50,000,000, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to get rid of diseased cattle, and to provide relief up to $50,000,000 by buying dairy and beef products.

The estimate that has come in here is distributed in this fashion, as appears on page 52 of the hearings:

For disease control, $24,000,000.

For the purchase and making available for distribution of dairy products for relief, $25,000,000.

For the purchase and making available as beef for distribution of 2,000,000 head of cows for relief, both dairy and beef, at $25 per head, $50,000,000.

For benefit payments to producers cooperating in program to control production, $44,000,000.

For the purchase and distribution of cattle from drought-stricken areas, at the discretion of the Secretary as necessary, and reserve for other purposes, $6,000,000;

Total, $150,000,000.

Frankly, I can go along on the proposition to get rid of the diseased cattle. I can go along on the proposition to purchase dairy products and that sort of thing, $25,000,000, but I do not feel we should go into the proposition of a processing tax on cattle or on dairy products. If we go into a processing tax, which will raise $100,000,000, in order to raise $50,000,000 of it you would have to have a processing tax of approximately 2 cents a pound on butter fat. To raise $50,000,000 more, you would have to have a processing tax of approximately 50 cents per 100 pounds upon cattle. That proposition, in my opinion, would hurt the producer. I do not believe it would help them a bit. When you have a surplus of any agricultural commodity and put a processing tax on it, it has been pretty well demonstrated by the wheat and hog situation that that processing tax comes out of the producer. It will put another burden on our farmer and make his lot a little worse.

I think that this proposition of buying cattle in the drought-stricken area is probably all right. I think it should be done. I think it should be done out of the funds that are provided for the relief; but I do not believe we should go to the point of having a processing tax on either cattle or dairy products. To my mind, we are getting further into that than we should go at this time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. I want to call attention to the fact that the Department, in coming before us, told us that they did not know what the processing tax would be; that it would run anywhere from $14,000,000 to $42,000,000, but, frankly, there is no definite commitment. There was a definite commitment when this bill was before the House that there would not be any such processing tax, and I do not believe—and frankly a lot of dairymen and a lot of cattle people do not believe—but what the Department would put enough processing tax on the dairy and cattle industry to raise the $100,000,000.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. How much loss would be assumed by the Government if they did not?

Mr. TABER. Oh, it will cost the Government the $100,000,000 if we do not have a processing tax. There is no question about that.

Mr. GOSS. Might it not cost more than that?

Mr. TABER. Not by this bill. If you appropriate $150,000,000, you will only lose $150,000,000. It would all be included in that. Of course, insofar as getting rid of diseased cows is concerned, that is a governmental function which has been going on for a long time; and it should be done; and it should be cleaned up. It is estimated that under this we would get rid of all of the tubercular cattle, or practically all of them, which now exist. Unquestionably that should be done. We would get rid of a very large number of other diseased cattle, both beef and dairy. There are at the present time unquestionably a larger number of cattle than there were 6 or 7 years ago. I think the increase in dairy cows runs from 23,000,000 up to 26,000,000 over the past 5 or 6 years.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. It has not been the policy of the Department of Agriculture up to this time to impose a processing tax on any commodity unless it met with the approval of the producers of that commodity, as ascertained through meetings with the producers and their representatives. Did the gentleman get the impression from the hearings that the Department might impose a processing tax on cattle or dairy products without the approval of the producers being secured?

Mr. TABER. Let me read to the gentleman, page 49 of the hearings:

How much processing tax do you expect to get out of the cattle industry?

Mr. PETRIE. Well, under the various plans considered, it will vary from $13,000,000 to $14,000,000 a year, up to three times that much.

That is taken from the hearings. Frankly, in view of the fact that it was generally understood when the bill was on the floor authorizing this thing, I am afraid that they will put on a processing tax for the whole business.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman knows that the A.A.A. very recently submitted a plan covering the levying of a processing tax on dairy products to the dairy farmers of the country, which plan was rejected by the dairy farmers. I understand that by reason of that rejection the Department has abandoned the plan, which would indicate, it seems to me, that they do not intend to force a processing tax on an industry which does not desire it.

Mr. TABER. These hearings were held on May 8, just about 10 days ago. Frankly, I believe that is the last word from the Department. That is their last message, that they are going to have a processing tax.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. I do not doubt but what the Department may further try to sell the idea of a processing tax to the producers, but I personally do not believe they will try to impose on the producers of any commodity a processing tax when they do not want it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. I do not believe they will try to impose a processing tax on any commodity where the producers themselves are adverse to such a tax.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman read a portion of Mr. Petrie's testimony. The gentleman understands that it was shown at the time of the hearings that none of this will be done without calling in representatives of the industry. They have appointed a committee of 25, of which a subcommittee of 5 has been appointed to work out a program. There probably will be no processing tax for the time, but if there is it will be a very small one, and then only if and as the industry is in condition to stand it.

Mr. TABER. I agree with the gentleman that the industry is not in condition to stand it; but we find ourselves in this situation, that we were told from the floor that there would not be a processing tax, yet they come back here now and tell us there will be a little one. I believe we are going to have a big one, and that it will do to these industries just what it did to the hog industry, and just what I believe it did to the wheat industry.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman understands that a processing tax may be levied under the terms of the original act. This bill simply makes an appropriation available for the payment of the benefits without waiting for the collection from the processing fee; and if they are to have any program at all without appropriations there certainly will have to be a processing fee.

Mr. TABER. If they are to have any program at all, without a doubt they will have to get away from this proposition of the benefits of reduction agreements and things of that sort. There probably will not be the necessity for any processing tax if we do not go beyond the $50,000,000. That amount will help the situation very markedly, and it will not hurt.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield while he is on this subject?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. In the gentleman's district in New York are a lot of dairy cattle.

Mr. TABER. There are.

Mr. BLANTON. There are also some beef cattle in the gentleman's district.

Mr. TABER. Quite a lot; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill is designed to help both the beef-cattle industry and the dairy-cattle industry.

Mr. TABER. Frankly, I feel that that part of it which might result in a processing tax would hurt both the beef-cattle industry and the dairy-cattle industry.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not talking about that; I am talking about the purpose and the design of the bill, which are to help both industries.

Mr. TABER. I have not become convinced of the fact that the processing tax is designed to help them. I have always been of the opinion that it was designed to hurt them.

What we need to do, in my opinion, is to stop at least some of the importation of beef. We are still importing 19,000,000 pounds of beef annually from the Argentine. Now, I do not believe that when our beef is being sold at 8 cents a pound and Argentine beef can compete with it while paying a duty of 6 cents a pound that we should allow such a condition to continue.

I think we ought not to appropriate more than $50,000,000 in this bill, the amount authorized to take care of these diseased cattle and to take care of the relief proposed. I believe if we stop there that our cattle industry will be better off. My understanding is that the cattle industry and the sheep industry are beginning to brace up, and they are the only two items that were left alone by the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman, a member of the committee, be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. I think if the Department is given these two items involving the $50,000,000 which was authorized, that we will be doing all we ought to do, and that we will be doing something to help by getting rid of the diseased cattle, or getting them down to a very decided minimum.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. The cattlemen in my district, and I think perhaps the greater part of my district is devoted to cattle raising, are opposed to a processing tax on cattle. They are shivering there right now for fear there will be a processing tax. I received a letter from one of my constitutents the other day asking me to call upon Secretary Wallace and ask him to take the processing tax off of hogs.

Mr. TABER. I think they feel that way all over the United States; and I think Congress ought to pay some attention to the way the people feel.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WITHROW. I think the gentleman should make it clear also that under the beef and dairy cattle emergency relief measure, which we passed in the House, there was authorized an appropriation of $200,000,000 which was raised to $250,000,000 in the Senate. This resolution has cut that amount by $100,000,000.

Mr. TABER. That is true. At the same time I think it is also true that probably not more than the $150,000,000 carried in this bill could be used to good advantage between now and the first of the year, when Congress will again be in session.

It is also true that if we are to go into the problem of getting rid of cattle, we do not want to get ourselves into trouble. We have now a very decided drought trouble throughout the North and Middle West, in the gentleman's territory to a certain extent, and in Minnesota and the Dakotas to a more marked extent. The drought area extends all the way down to the central part of the Middle West. How much it is going to affect the dairy-cattle industry, no one knows, and no one can know until we see the full extent of the drought.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, do I understand the gentleman to say that in addition to this $100,000,000 cut that is recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman is a member, the gentleman is in favor of cutting the amount by another $100,000,000?

Mr. TABER. I am not in favor of going ahead with anything that calls for a processing tax. I am more afraid of that than anything else. I think it will do more damage to the cattle and dairy industry than anything else that could be done to them at this time.

Mr. WITHROW. I am very much opposed to a processing tax, too.

Mr. TABER. If this $100,000,000 was in here to get rid of the surplus cattle and use them up in this relief proposition, I would go along with it, because I believe that unquestionably before we get through the winter we will need that much cattle to feed the people, but I do not want to do that with a processing tax where the farmers are burdened a little bit more than they are now.

Mr. WITHROW. But under the provisions of the A.A.A. they do not have to replenish this money with a processing tax. The gentleman is proceeding entirely on the theory that the Agricultural Department is going to raise the money through a processing tax, and I believe that is a false assumption.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman listen to this? We came on the floor with a bill and were told there would not be a processing tax. The Agricultural Department has the power under the bill, the way it was finally passed, to put a processing tax on. The Department now comes in and tells us that there is going to be a processing tax. Does the gentleman believe what the Department, who has the power to do the job, says or what the House thought when this bill was before the House and it was passed?

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BACON. I think the gentleman is quite correct that the Department intends to put on a processing tax, although when the original bill was before the House it was stated here that there would be no processing tax. I propose to offer an amendment to this bill providing that in carrying out this final reduction program there shall be no processing tax, and I believe that we ought to add that provision to this bill.

Mr. TABER. I think that should be done.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, on one proposition he discussed I agree four-square with the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and that is that in reducing, at Government expense, our supply of beef and dairy cattle in this country it is incumbent upon us to stop the foreign beef that is coming in here across our borders yearly, not only from Argentina but from all over old Mexico. Our market is flooded with millions of pounds of frozen beef from foreign countries. It is continually streaming in here. The big packers have their packing plants down there in Mexico and in Argentina, and peon labor is used to produce it.

In the first place, the beef is raised by Mexican peon labor and by South American peon labor that they can get for practically nothing. The seasons are fine in both Mexico and Argentina. They have fine grass all the year round, and do not have to pay one dollar for feeding. These Mexican and South American peons do not know what the American standard of living is, and are glad to work long hours and for only a very small part of what American labor receives. They get labor for practically nothing, and then the packers in Mexico and Argentina conduct their business with this cheap foreign labor, and constantly bring millions of pounds of this frozen beef into this country, and it helps to glut our market every year. They are going to continue to do so if we do not stop them. We should declare an embargo against all foreign cattle and beef.

It is foolish for this Congress to provide $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 to reduce the beef supply of this country and then continue to let this foreign frozen beef come in here across our borders. That ought to be stopped, and it ought to be stopped in this session of Congress. Let us put a rider on this bill, either by rule or in the Senate, where it does not require a rule and it could be added very easily, which will stop foreign beef coming across the borders.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The gentleman will recall the bargaining provisions of a bill which we passed recently giving the President of the United States authority to make agreements with the other nations of the world. Under the authority of that act he could handle the situation that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope he will. But he may not. We should direct it to be done. They not only bring in frozen beef but they bring in live cattle and then send it to pastures or feed pens, and thence to our packers.

A great multimillionaire, the editor of a string of newspapers all over the United States, William Randolph Hearst, has brought from his ranch in old Mexico, a ranch that is run with peon labor, cattle from across the Rio Grande, and for several months he has been feeding these cattle in feed pens out in the western counties of Texas. Every bit of that beef, when it is perfected, will be shipped to Chicago, or St. Louis, or Kansas City, and thus he and other such feeders will flood the country with Mexican beef. That ought to stop.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. I quite agree with the gentleman from Texas. In order to protect the cattle industry from Mexican competition, does not the gentleman think we ought to have a protective tariff that will protect the cattle from all States of the Union?

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to stop it. We ought not just put a tariff in effect, but we ought to stop it altogether by putting an embargo on foreign cattle and beef.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. May I ask the gentleman if he agrees with me that probably all these industries that have a processing tax, which makes up for the gift we are making to them because it interferes with the volume of their sales, would not desire ultimately to have the ordinary taxpayer pay the bill and the consumer who is supposed to have been getting beef rather cheaply pay the processing tax?

Mr. BLANTON. Eventually when we get the consuming public of the United States back on their feet where again they can buy, we will not have any trouble with surplus beef or processing taxes. Beef is something that every working man must have if he has the money to pay for it. He needs meat when he works hard. He will have the meat if he has the money, and when Franklin D. Roosevelt and this administration gets the American people back on their feet again, they will buy all marketable beef and we will not have any trouble, and I think that day is coming soon.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, let us get this matter clearly before us. This bill is not a bill levying a processing tax. There is nothing in the world in the measure authorizing the levying of a processing tax. This question was passed upon when you had the legislation before the House in response to which this appropriation is made. Therefore, I am not going to discuss the processing-tax feature except to say that the processing tax on wheat and cotton is practically paying the entire cost of administration, and if the Department levies a processing tax on beef, the estimates are it will be so small that it will not raise under $13,000,000 or over $40,000,000. In this event the Federal Government will be contributing to relief of the cattle and dairy industry $110,000,000 out of its Treasury. I am going to leave the further discussion of this matter to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] or someone else familiar with the subject.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I am very much interested in the matter of a processing tax. When this original measure was before the House I asked some very definite questions of the gentleman in charge of the bill, and I have been referring to the RECORD about it. I was definitely told by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] that there was a definite understanding with the Secretary of Agriculture that there should be no processing tax of this nature in the immediate future. I should like to know whether, under the provisions of this bill, it is the intention of the administration now to put a processing tax of this character on beef cattle and on the dairy industry.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Not immediately.

Mr. SNELL. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I cannot tell the gentleman. I can only tell the gentleman what the hearings show. If there is a processing tax, the hearings show, it will be a very light one.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand from hastily looking over the hearings, there will be a processing tax, and very soon.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is not clear; no.

Mr. SNELL. It is not clear, but the gentleman is responsible for this business, and the gentleman represents the administration and should be in a position to tell us the exact situation, in my opinion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not in position to tell the gentleman what has not yet been determined. In other words, they had a conference yesterday, and they are perhaps having one today with the cattle and dairy industries at the Department of Agriculture, and the result of this conference will determine the policy of the Department.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to seem persistent, but we were told definitely by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] when the original bill was passed that it was understood with the Secretary of Agriculture there would be no such tax, and we are surprised to have this brought forward now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I feel confident that whatever assurance was given the gentleman by my colleague from Texas will be lived up to.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will consult the exact language used then and the exact language used by Mr. Petrie in the hearings, he will find they are in exact accord—that there would probably be none immediately, or, if there was, it would be a very small one, and there would be no program laid out until they called in representatives of the industry and had them agree on a program; and this is what is being done.

May I also call attention in this connection to the fact that the question of levying the processing fee is not involved in this legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Absolutely not.

Mr. JONES. Under the terms of the act already passed, they have all the authority that is necessary to put on a processing fee. This measure will make an amount of money available which will probably make a processing fee unnecessary for the time being or make unnecessary any considerable processing fee. It may be they will have a small one.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I like the gentleman's statement except the very last of it. As I understand, the report states that the cattle-reduction program will be subject to the processing taxes like the other commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. JONES. Of course, it is and it has been all along. The statement was made in the report and made on the floor that this legislation enabled them to have all the benefits and privileges of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. SNELL. There is no disagreement so far as that is concerned, because I agree that the power is there at the present time.

Mr. JONES. Then, why is the gentleman objecting to an appropriation that will at least make any considerable tax unnecessary for the present?

Mr. SNELL. At the present time I am not objecting to the appropriation.

Mr. JONES. Why does the gentleman object when the various organizations concerned want this money made available, just like money was made available in advance of the cotton program?

Mr. SNELL. I am not objecting to that part of the measure, but the industries do not want a processing tax, and when the gentleman and his committee presented the original bill the House was given to understand we would not have a processing tax.

Mr. JONES. I should like the gentleman to read the direct statement to the effect there would be none.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentlemen will have to wait and get recognition in their own time, because I cannot yield further.

Mr. SNELL. It ought to appear in the RECORD right here.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I cannot yield further.

Mr. SNELL. Page 1963.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I cannot yield further.

Mr. SNELL. Very well, if the gentleman does not want to hear the facts:

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman can bring that out in his own time.

Mr. Speaker, there is something else in this bill besides an appropriation for the livestock and dairy industry, and I want to discuss another feature of the measure.

The appropriation for livestock and dairying is $150,000,000, which will be sufficient to conduct operations until next January. By that time we can determine whether or not the program is a success.

If it is not a success, we need not use the other 100 million. If it is a success, we will go on with it.

The next section is an appropriation to carry into effect the Bankhead bill, the cotton bill. I want to talk to you about that. There are 1,075 cotton-producing counties in the United States. One thousand of them produce a material quantity, and in each of these 1,000 counties it will be necessary to have a separate organization. Here are the employees that will be necessary for each county. Mind you, there are 1,500,000 cotton farmers in the United States.

In each county they will have to have 1 executive secretary at $2,100; three clerks and stenographers, temporary employees, at $3 a day; 3 committeemen at $3 a day. These committeemen act as the court of a quasi-judicial character to pass on how large an allotment each farmer in that county will be allowed to produce, tax-exempt, under the Bankhead bill.

There will be 10 local committeemen at $3 per day who see to it that all contracts entered into are complied with. All are appointed from residents of such counties.

The extension agent, or county agent, will serve in collaboration without extra pay.

Then they have three State administrators, who will keep in contact with the organizations and keep them in order and have proper procedure. They get $10 a day when actually employed. Rentals, office and equipment, $100,000; telegraph and telephone, $75,000; administration expenses, Washington office, $279,030; making a total administration expense, including allocation to Internal Revenue Bureau, $1,250,000, $8,250,000.

Now, how are we going to get the funds to finance this? In the first place, there is a $6,000,000 surplus in the processing tax of the A.A.A. They will have that $6,000,000 for the administration, which is authorized by this resolution, and that leaves $2,250,000 deficit for the administration of the bill. Where will you get that?

You will remember that under the Bankhead bill 10,000,000 bales is set as the maximum production. That is tax-exempt. If there is over 10,000,000 bales produced the surplus is taxed at 50 percent. If there should be an excess of 300,000 more than the 10,000,000 bales this act will be self-sustaining. In other words, the tax on the surplus cotton produced will be more than sufficient to pay for the entire administration expenses of the act.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will.

Mr. MOTT. It was my understanding at the time the bill was passed that the tax was not on the cotton produced but on the cotton actually sold.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; the tax applies to all produced over 10,000,000 bales.

Mr. MOTT. I understood that it only applied to the portion over the 10,000,000 bales which was sold.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES. If he keeps it himself and does not put it into the market, he does not pay the tax.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If he puts it in the warehouse.

Mr. JONES. No; he may warehouse it and leave a record at the gin. He may take it home or put it in the warehouse, and it is not taxed until it goes in commerce.

Mr. HOPE. When it is sold, and it is assumed that it will be sold if a man goes to the trouble of ginning it and putting it in a warehouse, he may sell it the same year or the next year, and he pays the tax when it is sold.

Mr. JONES. He pays the tax when it is sold, but he may use it on his next year's exemption.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What difference does it make, whether the tax is paid next year or when the monthly report is required of him, which I think you will find is correct, or when it is sold? Whenever it is sold the tax is paid, and when that tax is paid, if there are 300,000 bales surplus, it pays the entire administration of this act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can the gentleman conceive of a cotton farmer selling his excess bales when he is faced with a 50-percent tax?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly. The tax is there and it is going to stay there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But he will not sell.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is there, and it is going to stay there. He cannot get rid of it by keeping his cotton. If there is any money in it coming to him he will sell it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There cannot be any profit in it with a 50-percent tax.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He can get his expenses out of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But it is aimed to be a prohibitive tax.

Mr. MOTT. How can he get expenses out of it if he is charged 50 percent of the cost of it?

Mr. BUCHANAN. He will get 50 percent of the value of that bale back, and he is not going to leave it in there.

Mr. MOTT. But his expense of raising that cotton is more than the 50-percent tax that he would have to pay, is it not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; the gentleman is getting into a problematical question now, as to what the price of cotton will be.

Mr. BOILEAU. The cotton bill provides that the tax shall be imposed only on that produced over and above his allotment. It is not contemplated that he will produce anything over his allotment, so that you cannot expect any real revenue.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Has the gentleman kept up on statistics of cotton production?

Mr. BOILEAU. The Bankhead Act does not contemplate the revenue.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I know that. It contemplates prohibition, but what decree of Congress can control the seasons and cotton pests that regulate production?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. In the event that a cotton farmer produces or raises more cotton than is allotted him, of course, as the gentleman has already explained, he can hold that excess amount over to the next year and reduce the amount next year, and let that come within the amount allotted him.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is correct.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is one other question that I should like to hear the gentleman discuss. Is it not a fact that most of the cotton has been planted already in the Southern States?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is pretty difficult now to reduce it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; but the beauty about it is that the contracts for cotton reduction of acreage have all been signed in 90 percent of the cotton area, and that reduction in those contracts will be just about what those allotments would be.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman consider the processing tax on hogs a success?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have not gone into the processing tax on hogs, but if the gentleman wants to know my humble opinion, I doubt whether a processing tax on livestock and dairy cows or hogs or any other livestock will ever be a success.

Mr. TRUAX. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. However, on cotton and wheat and things of that kind it may be a success.

Mr. TRUAX. One year ago on the Chicago market lard sold for $6.75 a hundred. Today, with the processing tax, it is selling for $6.12, a loss of nearly 65 cents a hundred pounds since we have had the processing tax. They are taking it off of the farmer and putting it on the consumer, and both are losing money.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. JONES. May I suggest in that connection, without undertaking to defend the hog program, the benefit paid to the hog grower will make the total price considerably above the price of a year ago.

Mr. TRUAX. But the benefits and the tax combined will not anywhere near equal the cost of production.

Mr. JONES. That is a different story.

Mr. TRUAX. I want a program that will give us the cost of production.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The argument now is that on account of the tax the revenue will be so large that this act will be self-sustaining?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is correct. No appropriation out of the Treasury is carried in this resolution for the administration of this act.

Mr. MOTT. My recollection of the debate upon this bill is that the argument was that on account of the amount of the tax nobody would raise an over-plus of cotton and there would not be any revenue at all. Now, which is correct?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is no cotton farmer on the face of the earth who can control the quantity of his production.

One year he might make a bale to the acre, according to the season. Next year he might have a half a bale to the acre, or a quarter or a few hundred pounds. Next year it might be a failure. There is nobody on earth who can control his production. I venture to say, I hope right now there will not be over 10,000,000 bales produced in the United States. Still, if we have extra good seasons, favorable seasons, we will make 12,000,000 bales of cotton.

Mr. MOTT. Then, if the gentleman will permit, this act is undertaking to levy a 50-percent tax upon the cotton farmer when he raises an overplus of cotton through no fault of his own, but by an act of God?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Correct.

Mr. MOTT. And the gentleman is still in favor of this bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, I am still in favor of this bill as a temporary measure, and a temporary measure only, because the farmer who raises a surplus and is subject to a 50-percent tax, will get a great deal more than he loses, from the increased price on that which is exempt from the tax.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; not on hogs. I am through with hogs.

Mr. TRUAX. But this is not with reference to hogs. Was it not the intent and purpose of the law that the fees collected through the processing tax should be returned to the growers and not to the bureaucrats down in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The processing tax levied on cotton will produce from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and thirty million dollars a year.

Mr. TRUAX. And that is to be spent for more jobs and more Wall Street lawyers and more professors?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That processing tax is dedicated to be returned to the farmer and for the administration of the act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] has again expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words.

There was something said a few moments ago about the argument that took place about the processing tax at the time the original bill was passed. I want to refer to page 1963 of the RECORD. I asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] this question at the end of some other remarks:

> I am especially interested in having the gentleman from Texas tell the House what it is intended to do in regard to the processing tax as affecting the dairy industry.

This is the gentleman's reply:

> Mr. KLEBERG. May I suggest to the gentleman that the taxes that might affect either of the two industries would affect them only as they both belong to the cattle industry. It has been tentatively and, I might say, tacitly agreed—and, with permission, I will include a statement of the Secretary of Agriculture in my remarks—that for the immediate future no processing tax would be adopted in connection with this program.

Now, if that is not a definite statement, I do not understand the English language.

Then, further, I said to the gentleman from Texas: "Now, the important part is what you mean by 'the immediate future.'" This is Mr. KLEBERG's reply—I do not seem to find it, but the important part was that he said there will be no processing tax until the price of these products has been increased, and they could not stand it until such time. I know very well that dairy products in my State have not increased. I think this is an entire reversal of the whole program if you are going to start now to put a processing tax on dairy products.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield for a clarifying suggestion, since I have been brought into the discussion?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. I should like to call attention to the fact that in order to understand what we are trying to do it is necessary to reasonably know the Agricultural Adjustment Act and what it contains with reference to powers with reference to this money that we are talking about now.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman that the power is there.

Mr. KLEBERG. The gentleman, of course, knows that under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, in addition to the processing-tax feature, there is a power whereby the producers and processors may set up marketing agreements.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with that.

Mr. KLEBERG. Under the expenditure of the $50,000,000 discussed so ably by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], which will inevitably result in a reduction of the available supply of both dairy and beef cattle, and the gentleman is well enough acquainted with the law of supply and demand to know that when production is limited it is reasonable and proper to expect an increase in the price of the commodity involved. So it should be evident that the expenditure in reduction of available cattle should result in better prices.

Now, I would like to add that if and when that occurs the cattlemen, and I happen to be one of them myself, are not asking for any direct aid or contribution by the Government of the United States. They, and I as one of them, are willing to undertake to repay that which it costs the Government of the United States to bring them out of this difficult position.

Further in reply to the gentleman from New York I quote from the hearings before our committee last January on the bills H.R. 6133 and H.R. 7153, a question I asked Mr. Wilson, one of the "big four" packers who appeared before our committee, and his reply:

> Mr. KLEBERG. Do you agree with me to the extent that you would be willing to say that the Government would be safe in making an authorization of $200,000,000 and thereafter work out a means for the amortization of or otherwise to take care of the investment in beef cattle; that is, do you think that it would be a safe investment, or do you think that the money could ever be repaid?
> Mr. WILSON. Well, I think that a plan could be worked out, a practical plan, whereby it might be repaid by some agreement between the producers and the processors.

This reply by Mr. Thomas H. Wilson, of Wilson & Co., should convey at least the idea that there might be means other than the processing tax to recapture the expenditures of the Government on behalf of the cattle industry.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the statement the gentleman has just read from the report of this committee and from the statement made by the distinguished gentleman himself, there is no doubt in my mind but what it is the intention of the Department at a very early date to put a processing tax on the dairy industry of this country. It is my claim that if they do that, it will be putting into effect the absolute opposite of the proposition that was presented to us on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Texas himself at a time when he said he represented the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary's position on this proposition.

Mr. KLEBERG. I made the statement then and still make it, that no processing tax was contemplated for the immediate future.

Mr. SNELL. If the Department goes ahead and puts a processing tax on beef and dairy products, it will be contrary to the statements made on the floor of the House at the time the matter was originally under consideration, and will mean the complete destruction of the dairy industry of our State and the whole country.

Mr. KLEBERG. Now, may I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. KLEBERG. By what authority does the gentleman presuppose that the minute this bill is passed the Department is going to place a processing tax upon the beef and dairy cattle industry?

Mr. SNELL. I can have no authority, but no Member on the majority side denied my statement. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] and the chairman of the committee speak for the Department; I do not, and you both refuse to state that it will not be done.

Mr. KLEBERG. As I said a moment ago, I still stand by what I said.

Mr. SNELL. Neither the report accompanying the bill nor the hearings give us any assurance that a processing tax will not be imposed, and in my judgment they both infer an immediate processing tax. The gentleman stands here representing the Department and should speak as positively now against it as he originally did.

Mr. KLEBERG. I wish to ask the gentleman another question, for I desire to clear up what may be a misunderstanding. I should like to know why the gentleman undertakes to state with considerable alarm that in the immediate future a processing tax will be placed on these commodities? Can this be mere conjecture?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman deny it? Will the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee deny it? You do not dare to. What I want is to get you who represent the administration to assure me and the dairy people you will not impose a processing tax on us.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, as of this late date there is nothing Congress can do except to enact this bill. The mistake was made when the Bankhead bill was passed and when cattle were made a basic commodity. It will require money to carry out this program, and the money obviously must come from one of two sources, either directly out of the Treasury of the United States, which means out of the pockets of all the people of the United States, or from a processing tax on the supposedly benefited industry.

As of this moment, a processing tax placed upon dairy products would be ruinous; for that matter it always will be ruinous. We can mark it down now that we are never going to use the processing tax successfully on hogs, dairy products, or beef. So, if we are to carry out this program there is but one source from which to get the money, and that is from the pockets of the taxpayers of this country. Having adopted the program there is probably nothing left to do but to go through with it. This much is certain, however, that at the end of the road—and it makes no difference whether you raise the money by a processing or by direct taxes on the people—you are not going to reduce production materially. When the time comes that by the act of Congress initiative is taken away from the American people to the point that they produce less than they are able to produce, then the American people will have deteriorated to the point of not being the class of people who were their fathers and mothers. It is simply contrary to every rule of human nature to talk about reducing production below the ability of human beings to produce. Let me give you an illustration: This very Congress adopted the Agricultural Adjustment program in an effort to force reduction; but at the same identical time Congress authorized appropriations for the purpose of increasing production. The very Agricultural Department which is now carrying on a program to do the unnatural thing of trying to reduce production has called upon this Congress and has been granted by it appropriations to increase production.

To cite a further illustration, the Secretary of Agriculture himself, Henry Wallace, this disciple of reduced production, cannot refrain from trying to increase production when he can sell seed corn for $6 a bushel. Wallace, who is advocating as the salvation of the American farmer 25-percent-reduced corn production, is connected with a company that has developed a seed corn which will increase production by 25 percent, a species of corn developed by Mr. Wallace himself, of his own ingenuity. So we see today Wallace, the Secretary of Agriculture, advocating a reduction of corn acreage; but Wallace, the individual, selling at $6 a bushel corn which will increase production 25 percent per acre. It is the most human thing in the world that he should sell a seed corn which would increase production. I cite this as proof to the House that the whole program of trying to reduce production by force is so unnatural that it cannot work as long as American people are human beings.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. HART. That corn is better than the gentleman thinks, for it is selling at $7 a bushel.

Mr. McGUGIN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close after the gentleman consumes his 5 minutes. This paragraph deals only with cotton.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, speaking about Secretary Wallace and his two programs, the program of Secretary Wallace to reduce the corn acreage and the program of Citizen Wallace to increase it, may I read a few words from an article which recently appeared in the press of this country?

[From the Chicago Tribune of May 13, 1934]

HENRY WALLACE IN TWO ROLES ON CROP REDUCTION—OWNS FIRM SELLING SEED CORN

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 12.—As the Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace is conducting an intensive campaign to induce corn growers to agree to reduce their acreage by 20 percent to boost the price of corn.

As a private citizen, Mr. Wallace, through his ownership in the Hi-Bred Corn Co., of Grimes, Iowa, is selling seed corn to Iowa and Illinois farmers which is advertised to produce 19.8 percent more bushels to the acre.

Farmers who will buy Citizen Wallace's seed corn, therefore, may cut their acreage by 20 percent, receive the Federal bonus money offered by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, and still produce for the market the same quantity of corn which they grew with their old-fashioned local seed corn.

EDITOR ON LEAVE

In Wallace's Farmer, a farm weekly of which Secretary Wallace is "editor on leave of absence", farmers are besought in editorial columns to sign the corn-acreage-reduction contracts. In adjoining columns they are urged to buy and plant Wallace's Hi-Bred seed corn because it will produce more corn to the acre.

The farmers are told in so many words that they may cut their acreage by 25 percent and still produce the same amount of corn, with resulting economy of money and labor.

The consuming public pays the price of Secretary Wallace's program by increased costs of food, due to processing taxes, and Citizen Wallace profits personally by the sale of seed corn sold by his own company, advertised in the paper of which he is editor on leave, and used to defeat the very purpose of the reduction program.

CLAIMS MADE FOR CORN

In Wallace's Farmer of December 23, 1933, an advertisement of the Hi-Bred Corn Co. appears in which it is claimed that 210 farmers who used the company's seed corn averaged 11.4 more bushels per acre over local corn. This was an average increased yield, the advertisement stated, of 19.8 percent.

On the very next facing page, under the heading "Pushing the Corn-Hog Program", the readers are given arguments and specific directions on how to join the acreage-reduction campaign. At the top of the next page, under the heading "Editorials", the first editorial starts out as follows:

"We sympathize with the farmer who wants to grab the first copy of the corn-hog contract he sees, puts his signature on it, rush the contract to Washington, and get his check back next week."

ADVERTISES SEED CORN

In the issue of January 21, 1933, when Mr. Wallace was editor of the magazine and president of the Hi-Bred Corn Co., and when Mr. Roosevelt was awaiting his inauguration, the corn company, under Wallace's own signature, advertised its prolific seed corn under the heading "Balancing the Farm Acreage—Larger Yields from Smaller Fields."

Mr. Wallace stated that if the entire Corn Belt were planted with the best strains of his seed corn, the result in the ordinary year would be an increase in corn yields of 300,000,000 bushels. He conceded this would be a "most serious calamity."

But then he stated:

"In our sales efforts we do our best to get corn farmers to cut their corn acreage by 25 percent by putting one fourth of the land into clover, and by planting Hi-Bred corn on the three fourths it is ordinarily possible to get the same yield with much less labor."

FOR MAXIMUM PRODUCTION

At the end of the same advertisement Mr. Wallace declared:

"The problem of civilization is to make it socially advantageous for the individual to produce to the maximum. The Hi-Bred Corn Co. is fully acquainted with this problem and through its officers is doing its best to get the people of the United States to use efficient methods for social ends. When we improve our efficiency and control it in a balance way, we can all of us have twice as high a standard of living as we now enjoy."

In the January 1, 1933, issue of Wallace's Farmer the Hi-Bred Corn Co. advertised its corn as "Wallace Hi-Bred seed corn", and said 1,000 tests had shown an average increased yield per bushel of seed of 84 bushels of corn over the yield with ordinary seed corn.

"Four more hogs in every bushel" was the heading on this advertisement, which in text explained that the 84 bushels would be enough to produce four extra hogs a year.

The issue of December 9, 1933, carries a head on the front cover: "We must cut hog production", and another advertisement of Hi-Bred seed corn appears on page 10.

URGES ACREAGE REDUCTION

In the magazine of November 25, 1933, an address by Secretary Wallace is published, in which he argued for the acceptance by the corn farmers of the acreage-reduction contracts. A half-page advertisement of the Hi-Bred Corn Co. appearing on page 2 repeats the promise of 12 more bushels to the acre by using the Wallace seed corn.

Secretary of Agriculture Wallace is now sending out thousands of "advance checks" to corn growers who have signed up under the acreage-reduction program. These partial payments are given for the farmers' promise to reduce acreage, the balance to be paid at the end of the season.

If they follow the advertisements in Wallace's Farmer, the farmers will take Secretary Wallace's checks, buy Citizen Wallace's seed corn, and market just as many bushels as they did in years past, and get another Federal money bonus at the end of the season, even though their production was not reduced by an ear.

There is the illustration. It makes no difference whether we use the processing tax or use money out of the Treasury of the United States, in the end we are not going to reduce production in this country. One way or the other, human ingenuity will see to it that the American people produce what they are able to produce. Down in the Cotton Belt we are told that they used more fertilizer and the production of cotton has not decreased. That was not criminal conduct. That was natural human conduct. It was ambition, which is instilled in thrifty citizens. It was the trait that made this country great, and this Congress, no matter what the political exigencies of the future may be, is not going to be able to destroy that trait in the American people.

So far as this bill is concerned, with the program already started, probably all that we can do is to pass it; but I warn you now that whatever may be the ultimate end, it will not include reducing production. The mistake was made when we started these two programs, the Bankhead bill and declaring livestock to be a basic commodity. However, that is water over the dam. Above all we should here today put in this bill that no processing tax shall be levied during the coming year on any dairy or beef products. If you do levy such a tax, you will have done incalculable wrong to the dairy and beef industry. You will not have been their beneficiary.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If we do not put a restriction on the passage of this resolution, maybe it will just lend encouragement to the Department to put a 5-percent-per-pound processing tax on dairy products immediately.

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes. Those who are in control of the Agricultural Department are primarily desirous of using this bill in order to obtain control over agriculture as an industry, so that the farms of this country will be operated under decrees from Washington, rather than by the farmers themselves.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the purposes of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle and other products as basic agricultural commodities, and for other purposes" (Public, No. 142, 73d Cong.), approved April 7, 1934, there are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, pursuant to the authorizations contained in sections 2 and 6 of said act of April 7, 1934, $100,000,000 for the purposes of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, and $50,000,000 for the purposes specified in section 6 of said act of April 7, 1934, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and other necessary expenses; in all, $150,000,000 to remain available until December 31, 1935.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Reserving the right to object, would the gentleman be willing to make that 45 minutes? There are several gentlemen on this side who want to be heard.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think we can get through in 30 minutes.

Mr. BACON. I have a real amendment to offer.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I tried to get in on the other paragraph, and the gentleman stated I might have that privilege here.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I am allowed 5 minutes of that time, I will not object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know whether we on this side are going to get a chance to say something. From the gentlemen who are on their feet over there, it would seem they will consume all the 40 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman will have to get recognition from the Speaker.

Mr. TRUAX. I understand that, but I want 5 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Anyone who can stop the gentleman from getting 5 minutes on anything is good.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, a year ago, when Congress passed the Agricultural Act, we established a policy authorizing a processing tax. It was in the original act that we authorized a processing tax, and that act provided no other way for paying cash benefits or giving direct assistance to the agricultural interests of the country except by raising the money through a processing tax. That was an essential part of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and of the program which has been carried out since that time.

We were successful in getting dairy products included as a basic agricultural commodity. A year passed, and no program was offered or given to the dairy industry of the country. During this session of Congress a bill was enacted to make cattle also a basic agricultural commodity, and the bill authorized $200,000,000 to be used for the relief of the dairy and cattle industry. That was a concession to the dairy and cattle industry, because it was realized on the part of the administration and by responsible Members of both Houses of Congress that the dairy and cattle industry was in such condition that it needed financial assistance and needed it promptly, and before the funds could be raised through a processing tax.

When that bill was originally sent over to the House Committee on Agriculture, it provided that the $200,000,000 would be made available under paragraph (b) of section 12 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which meant that it had to be repaid through a processing tax. We succeeded in the committee in obtaining an amendment making that $200,000,000 available under section (a), which leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture whether or not a processing tax should be levied to reimburse the Treasury to this amount.

Now, this amount of money, $200,000,000, was authorized for the purpose of giving this relief to the cattle and dairy industries, and it is not compulsory that a processing tax be levied. I believe, however, that sometime in the future and after the program starts, and if they are successful in raising the price of beef and dairy products, a processing tax may be imposed.

This bill only carries $100,000,000 of the $200,000,000; but the Department has made it very plain that they believe this $100,000,000 is about all they can spend between now and the first of January in working out a dairy- and beef-cattle program and in eradication of tubercular and Bangs' disease-infected cattle. This does not mean they are cutting the amount down to $100,000,000. It means we are presently appropriating $100,000,000, with the possibility of appropriating the other $100,000,000 next January or at some later date when that amount of money can be used. I should favor appropriating the entire $200,000,000 now, but the Department says they can get along for the present with the smaller amount.

In addition to this, we have $50,000,000 carried in this bill which is to be used for the relief of the dairy industry and the cattle industry, and it is specifically provided that this $50,000,000 shall not be repaid through the imposition of a processing tax. This is direct aid to the cattle and dairy industry; and I submit that the dairy industry, particularly, has been suffering so long, has been in need of assistance for so long, that we should get behind this measure immediately and pass the bill and send this appropriation over to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, thereby giving them funds to enable them to put out a program for the dairy industry that will give them the relief they need.

Not only have the principal dairy sections of the country suffered from low prices during the past few years but they have also suffered during the past 4 or 5 years from excessive droughts such as they have never before experienced in that great dairy section of Minnesota and Wisconsin where such a large part of the dairy products of the country are produced. They are in need of prompt assistance. This amount of money put into the hands of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration will place upon that Department the responsibility of putting out a program for the relief of the dairy industry. I may say now what I have said before, and that is, that I have confidence in the men who have charge of the dairy section of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and I believe they will solve this great problem in the interest of the dairy farmers.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and yield back such time as I may not use.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the gentleman does not anticipate using all his time, will he yield to me before making his statement?

Mr. KLEBERG. I shall be pleased to yield the gentleman whatever time I have left, and I only expect to take a few moments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WEST of Ohio). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to heartily endorse the sentiments expressed by my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

I also call the committee's particular attention to the fact that the legislation before us has been the result of long and exhaustive hearings, to which cattlemen and dairy farmers from all over the United States came to present their views. It should be clear to every member of the committee, first of all, with respect to the program to be undertaken in the expenditure of these funds, that an agreement is to be arrived at between the producers involved before any program goes forward; and I respectfully submit that ill-advised and ill-considered arguments concerning tentative possibilities are definitely in opposition to a return to that prosperity which we all desire, no matter to which side of the aisle we adhere; and I suggest particularly to my friend the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], whose statements I always appreciate, knowing his intelligence, that I cannot for the life of me see why he should undertake to say that something is going to take place before any of those involved have met to consider what plan is to be followed.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KLEBERG. I yield for a brief question, because I only want to take a moment or two.

Mr. TABER. When they come before us in the hearings and tell us what they are going to do, what would you believe?

Mr. KLEBERG. The gentleman should know the law, and the gentleman should know that in the past every one of these programs has been the result of agreement between the Department and the producers.

I now yield the balance of my time to my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, there are two things about which I should like to be sure before this measure is voted upon.

First of all, if a processing tax is to be levied, I should like to know how much it will be, and, secondly, I should like to know whether or not the passage of this particular bill will lend encouragement to the Department to put into effect the processing-tax program they had in mind several weeks ago, a program which was abandoned as a result of the action taken by the dairy people of the country.

I cannot see that this measure is necessarily any encouragement to the Department of Agriculture to put into effect a 5-cents-per-pound processing tax on dairy products.

Mr. KLEBERG. If the gentleman will yield, may I ask why he says 5-cents-per-pound processing tax?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Of course, I say that only on the basis of some of the statements made by departmental heads several weeks ago. I have no right to assume they would ever put into effect a processing-tax program of that kind; and if I thought for one moment they were going to do it, I would certainly vote against this measure.

It is reasonable to contemplate that some processing tax may be levied, both in the beef-cattle industry and in the dairy industry. Mr. Petrie, chief of the cattle division of the A.A.A. testified that they do propose a processing tax to raise somewhere between $14,000,000 and $40,000,000.

If this resolution can be construed as an encouragement for heavy processing taxes on dairy products, then it should be defeated. The Agriculture Department has heretofore been committed to a processing tax of 5 cents per pound on butter fat, but had learned through regional meetings in the dairy sections of the country that the dairy farmers were bitterly opposed to such a tax. And the farmers are right. Any program of this nature would be disastrous to the dairy industry. Instead of helping a situation which is now admittedly bad, it would only make it worse.

If my memory serves me correctly, a processing tax of 5 cents per pound on butter fat would raise in excess of $100,000,000.

Now, it has been well said today that we have embarked on a program that will in no way be affected by this appropriation, except that it may mean the encouragement of the Department to put on a processing tax that the dairy industry is so bitterly opposed to and which it cannot stand, because of the situation in the industry itself. If I could be assured on those two points, I am perfectly willing to go along with this measure, because it does give some measure of relief to an industry that has reached the point where it cannot stand the strain much longer. [Applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I want to express my views on the general principle of the processing tax as a means of agricultural relief. In the N.R.A. we have fixed the price of practically every commodity you have to buy. You cannot trade in your old automobile for a new one unless you pay the price fixed by the N.R.A.

Last Friday the minimum prices of automobile tires were fixed, and you cannot go to any reputable dealer and buy a tire for one penny less than the price that has been fixed.

I ask you, if you have 10,000,000 unemployed men who are out of work, many starving, which will be the most benefit to them, some pork chops or a good beefsteak, or an automobile tire. Yet you fix it here so that these farmers are in an impoverished condition by the processing tax, and as proof of that I cite the fact that you have had the processing tax on hogs—and when Mr. Wallace put the tax on hogs, the Chicago packers said, "We will take that off the producer"; and they did that very thing, and they have been taking it off ever since.

Now, you come in and want to take the money that has been collected from the processing tax, $150,000,000, and use it to put some more bureaucrats down in this great mammoth building known as "the Department of Agriculture." You want to put in more young lawyers from New York to tell the farmers what to do; you want to put in some more professors, some more "crackpots", to tell the farmers how to farm.

Everybody knows what is wrong with the farmer. He has to sell his product at less than cost and has for the last 12 years. I want to say to you that in my State he is a damned sight worse off today than he was 1 year ago.

Every farmer in my State will bear me out. You do not want to give us the Frazier bill, for that would refinance them; you do not want to give us the McLeod bill—and we are willing to cut it to $2,500 maximum pay-off, including all banks. No; that will help the poor people of this country whose life savings are in these closed banks. You do not want to give us the Connery bill for 30 hours a week, for that would help the 10,000,000 unemployed who walk the streets today. No. When it comes to the farmer you have a Secretary of Agriculture making a specialty of selling seed corn at a high price, who makes a specialty of writing for newspapers and magazines, who makes a specialty of going back centuries ago to dig up religious problems of that day and compare them with the religious problems of our day.

You appoint as an Under Secretary of Agriculture a man who would serve better in a bureau of social reform or social economics rather than in farm economics; and, as usual, today the American farmer in the Corn Belt is the "forgotten man." I say to you that unless you do something more than you have already done for our farmers, then there is no hope and all is lost in despair. I yield right now for someone to stand up on this floor and tell me what we have done for the American farmer in the Corn Belt.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I will yield to the gentleman to tell me what we have done for the American farmer.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. I want to ask you if a little expansion of currency in silver——

Mr. TRUAX. Oh, yes, yes; but we want the expansion of prices first. We want 8-cent hogs and 10-cent cattle.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I will yield if you will tell me what we have done for the American farmer.

Mr. MAY. I will tell you. The gentleman and I were both for the processing tax in these bills when they were passed.

Mr. TRUAX. And we have found out that it does not work, and they want to take the money collected and put on more parasites in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. One of the gentlemen from Iowa made the statement that corn was selling at 6 cents——

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Six dollars.

Mr. TRUAX. The remarks I heard were about the corn that belonged to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. No. I was talking about the ordinary run of corn. What is corn selling for today as compared to what it was a year ago?

Mr. TRUAX. It is selling higher than it was a year ago, but in my State we do not have a dozen counties that sell corn. They feed it to livestock. I say this: That any 6-year-old boy ought to know that a program of acreage reduction will never control your surplus. Any boy ought to know that. Any boy ought to know that only God alone can determine that. It depends on your rainfall and upon the sun and upon natural conditions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. What about the price of wheat as compared with what it was a year ago?

Mr. TRUAX. The price of wheat is lower by 10 or 15 cents today than what it was a year ago. We had wheat up above a dollar nearly a year ago. What is wheat selling for today?

Mr. BEAM. Seventy cents.

Mr. PIERCE. On what market was it selling for more a year ago?

Mr. TRUAX. On the Chicago market, operated by the gamblers, who are still operating and manipulating prices.

Mr. PIERCE. By no means.

Mr. TRUAX. Let me show you the fallacy of this program if this drought continues. You will have curtailed production. The farmer in many cases will have nothing to sell. The consumer in the city will be highjacked and robbed by the packers and food trusts, such as the Quaker Oats Co. and the Kellogg Co., and the others who never reduce the price of their products to the consumer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BACON: Page 3, line 7, after the figures "1935", strike out the period and add the following: "Provided, however", That in carrying out the provisions of this act, the cattle reduction program shall not be subject to any processing taxes."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment. It changes existing law, and is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his point of order? I concede the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I think it has become very apparent that it is the intention of the Agricultural Department to put a processing tax on the dairy industry and the cattle industry as soon as possible, in spite of the fact that when the original bill was passed it was indicated here on the floor of the House that that was not contemplated. In the report of the chairman of our committee he states:

The cattle-reduction program will be subject to the processing taxes like the other commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does this bill provide an appropriation for the destruction of dairy cattle?

Mr. BACON. Absolutely.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the President approve of it?

Mr. BACON. I understand that he does.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me while I read a quotation?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. What I am about to read is taken from a speech delivered by President Roosevelt at Topeka, Kans., September 14, 1932, when he was speaking to the great agricultural West:

When the futility of maintaining the prices of wheat and cotton through so-called "stabilization" became apparent, the President's Farm Board, of which his Secretary of Agriculture was a member, invented the cruel joke of advising the farmers to allow 20 percent of their wheat lands to lie idle, to plow up every third row of cotton, and to shoot every tenth dairy cow. Surely they knew that his advice would not—indeed, could not—be taken. It was probably offered as the foundation of an alibi. They wanted to be able to say to the farmers of the United States: "Why, you did not do as we told you to. Now go blame yourselves."

I am wondering whether, when the President made that speech, he was in favor of destroying every tenth dairy cow.

Mr. BACON. It must be obvious that the President has changed his mind. This bill provides for the killing and processing of some five to seven million beef and dairy cows. The measure here that we have under discussion today is an emergency measure. It is specifically an emergency measure.

I believe if Congress really intends to prevent a processing tax being placed on the dairy industry, it should adopt my amendment. I admit the amendment is subject to a point of order, but the hearings indicate that the Department intends to place a processing tax on dairy products in an amount ranging from $14,000,000 to $40,000,000. I am sorry the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] has seen fit to make a point of order against the amendment, because in this emergency it seems to me we ought not subject the dairy industry or the cattle industry to a processing tax which will be very harmful to both of those industries.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. JONES. Under the program of the previous administration the farmers were urged to plow up as a voluntary matter, with no compensation and no increase in price. This is an entirely different program. It means something to the farmer.

Mr. BACON. I recognize it as an emergency.

Mr. JONES. There has been more talk by people who do not know anything about what the program is than I have ever heard before.

Mr. BACON. I do not want to submit this cattle-reduction program to a processing tax that will be harmful to the industry.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I concede the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WEST of Ohio). The Chair rules the point of order is sustained.

All pro forma amendments are withdrawn.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last four words.

I want to discuss for a moment or two the attack made upon Secretary Wallace, because he happens to develop seed corn that will produce 25 percent more corn per acre than the average farmer has been producing with his own seed. No Member of this House who wants to be logical would attack the Secretary upon that ground. The article referred to reads as if he waved a magic wand and, overnight, produced this corn which would yield 25 percent more. As a matter of fact, that has been a slow process running over a good many years, and qualifies him as a successful planner in agricultural matters. In the Department of Agriculture there are scientists who are working along that line and are being paid with money appropriated by this House. I have tried to cut from every appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture since I have been in the House everything of a stimulating character in excess of what was carried under the organic law, and I have failed in this House to get more than 1 or 2 votes for it. There are some 6,000 county agents scattered over the United States, whose duty it was to make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before. I have tried to remove them and failed. I have tried to remove all the appropriations from every bill that tended to increase production since I have been here, but it has been impossible to do so; yet you come here and criticize the Secretary of Agriculture because he has developed a seed corn that will produce in excess of the average seed corn and, therefore, cheaper corn than the ordinary grade of corn.

When you take that position you should immediately get rid of every scientist in the Department of Agriculture and get rid of every stimulating process that you have within that Department or any other Department. There are plenty of them down there. You should get rid of the seed and fertilizer loans, except in a national calamity where a whole section has been wiped out. You should get rid of the Agricultural Credit Corporation which provides for the financing of excess production. When you wipe out all those things then you may attempt to criticize your Secretary of Agriculture because he has proved to be a scientist.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HART. Yes; I yield for a question, not for a speech.

Mr. McGUGIN. Without criticizing, does the gentleman say it is consistent that on one page of Wallace's Farmer he should have an editorial advocating corn reduction, and on the next page an advertisement appealing to them to buy his high-powered seed corn at $7 a bushel, which will increase production 25 percent per acre? Is that consistent?

Mr. HART. It would not be reasonable to expect that Mr. Wallace would immediately end his business because he became Secretary of Agriculture. His business happens to be producing seed corn. It would be illogical for him to order his company to dissolve and quit his scientific work. However, as he only owns a minority interest in the company he could not do this if he wanted to. So much for the Secretary of Agriculture and his seed corn.

I now want to reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], and with especial reference to that portion of his remarks quoting a part of the President's Topeka address and its relation to the appropriation which we are talking about here for the cattle industry. All that is intended under this bill is to remove those cattle which are suffering from tuberculosis and to purchase such beef cattle as may be used in the distribution of food by the Government for relief purposes. There is no intention in this bill of destroying any good cattle or going out and shooting every tenth cow. We are simply providing money to carry on the tuberculosis-eradication program. I do not think anyone in the House would object to that.

The State of Michigan is now rated at 100 percent clean, with reference to tubercular cattle. I think that is a wholesome and healthy program to carry forward. There is no intention under this bill to go out and shoot every tenth cow or every eighth cow or any other cow, except to remove those cattle which are tubercular, and even those are to be put to some use. Also there is appropriated money to buy beef cattle and distribute them the same as they have distributed hogs and flour and butter and many other things to those who need food.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back any time I may have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HART] has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I beg the patience of the House for just a few moments. It is true that this bill does not add anything to or subtract anything from the power of the Secretary of Agriculture or the A.A.A. in the matter of processing taxes. It might be called a money bill. It is to finance, as I understand it, this proposed work between now and January 1 next. It does, however, bring up the whole question of how we shall treat the cattle industry. I have been in that business all my life. That is not to say by any means that I know all there is to know about it. There is something to learn about the cattle business all the time.

I wish to say a few words about the trend of the beef-cattle market during the last few months, in order, perhaps, that we may have a little better understanding of what the Government may do or may not do. The corn crop of 1932 was a very heavy one. It fetched a pitiably low price per bushel. When corn is low the feeders of cattle always put in more cattle to feed. That is their tendency. When feed is so cheap as 12 or 15 cents per bushel, of course, their temptation is to put more cattle on feed because they can produce the beef at such a low feed price. So a tremendous number of cattle were put on feed in the Middle West, or in the Corn Belt, commencing in the autumn of 1932, on account of the corn crop condition; and as feed was cheap many feeders started on the long feed, in other words to produce an animal that would weigh over 1,300, 1,400, or even up to 1,600 pounds when it was finished.

Inevitably, those cattle all arrived in the market a year later, and kept arriving on the markets at Chicago, Kansas City, St. Louis, and Omaha during the autumn of 1933 and the early winter of 1934. The finest finished 3-year-old steers weighing 1,600 pounds, animals fit for the show ring, fetched as low as 4½ cents a pound, and that was murder to the feeder. Lighter cattle, however, which are sometimes called "baby beef", sold for a good deal higher price per pound, up to 7½ cents, the animal weighing less than 1,000 pounds and not to exceed 2 years in age. In that particular class the supply had been constant.

The run of the heavies is over, and you may have noticed during the last 7 weeks there has been a complete transformation in the beef-cattle market. Heavy cattle—and I saw them in the Chicago yards myself last week weighing 1,600 pounds and down to 1,350—sold as high as 9½ cents a pound. Some Member on the floor a few minutes ago said that the cattlemen were praying for 10-cent cattle. They came within 50 cents a hundred of it last week.

The interesting and the important thing about it from the standpoint of the cattleman is that today and during the past 6 or 7 weeks, for the first time in 3 years at least, there is a proper spread between the finished bullock of weight and the raw material; by "raw material" I mean the thin stocker or feeder which was fetching in the yards last week from 4½ cents to 5 cents a pound. I happen to know because I went there to purchase them.

A spread between the stocker or feeder at 4½ cents and the finished product at 8¾ to 9 cents a pound puts the cattle market in a healthy condition, puts the range of prices in a healthy condition; and it is the first time we have had it in 3 years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. JONES. Not to be taken out of the allotted time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from New York may proceed for 3 additional minutes, not to be taken out of the time?

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My fear is that the Government will step in and make some dreadful mistake at a moment when the cattle market is just beginning to look bright.

I call attention to the fact—and I think it has some significance—that the Government as yet has done nothing with sheep, and the market for lambs has been consistently favorable and good all winter long. Lambs reached 9½ cents a pound, as I recall, last December; and today they are selling in Chicago between 9 cents and 10 cents. There has been no processing tax, there has been no reduction, there has been no agreement, there have been no contracts, the Government has kept its hands off lambs and this is the only branch of the livestock business that has been prospering. The cattle business would appear to be on the verge of reaching a decent condition. My dread is that the Government will do something to spoil it.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Is not that situation due to the number of sheep that have gone on the market? I am a sheep man.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly it is. The law of supply and demand has been left undisturbed with respect to lambs and to sheep, and the market has been excellent.

If the Government goes into this thing now and begins to put a processing tax on beef cattle and dairy cattle, it will meet impossible conditions in the attempt to make such a processing tax fair. A tax of 50 cents a hundredweight on an animal selling for 9 cents a pound is, of course, a very low tax, but canners sell on the market all the way down to 2 cents a pound, the old canner cow; and a 50-cent tax on her would be a very heavy tax.

There are an infinite variety of cattle, many breeds, each with its special virtue, and in ages and qualities, from "tops" to "canners." No government on earth can classify the beef cattle; their variety is infinite. The judgment of two men will seldom agree on the exact value of a certain load of steers. One man has one conception and another man well informed has another conception. When the Government gets into it and tries to classify for the purpose of fixing taxes it will simply make a botch of the whole thing.

I have used this occasion only to raise my voice in protest as a cattleman against any proposal, any suggestion, that the Government of the United States put a processing tax on beef cattle.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman from New York made some observations on the classification of cattle, and I think he knows something about that, because his classifications are correct; but from my observation I would say that the men down in the Department of Agriculture, the only kind of cattle they know about is "bull."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I think it is peculiarly appropriate that the gentleman from Ohio should bring up the subject he has just mentioned. [Applause.] I am not surprised and have no criticism when gentlemen over on the Jersey side attack the administration or its operation, but the gentleman from Ohio has been bawling around here for 6 months like a sick calf.

Mr. TRUAX. That is the way the farmers are. They are all sick under your program.

Mr. JONES. As a boy I visited a farm at one time and was looking at the cows. They had a big, fine brindle cow with long, wavy hair. I did not know much about dairy cows. I said, "That looks like a fine cow." The dairyman, who was an expert, said, "That cow? why that animal eats more and bawls louder and gives less milk than any cow in the world." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. No; I am sorry.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. TRUAX. I ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. JONES. No. I did not take up the gentleman's time. I was telling a story. I was not referring to the gentleman, and I am sorry he has put that interpretation on it.

Mr. TRUAX. I want to tell a story, too.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has told several already.

Mr. TRUAX. I am going to tell another one after the gentleman finishes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, this question of handling a farm program is a tremendous one. Ever since I was a boy the farmer has had a hard time getting anything done in his behalf and getting justice and equality. One of the difficulties has been that when any program is started, there are always some of the supposed friends that begin to assault the program. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] is sincere, but he is impatient and begins to complain before the program is started and before it has had a chance. Some people want the price raised over night, when for 12 long years policies have been pursued by the previous administrations that almost produced chaos. The farmer had been discriminated against so long that his efforts were paralyzed. Can you expect an administration in 12 months to clear all of the trash out of the White House which has accumulated there in 12 long years?

You cannot recover from a serious malady, such as typhoid fever, in 24 hours. You might have the best doctor that ever studied medicine and if you have had 3 or 4 months of typhoid fever and are nearly dead it takes time before you can improve. You might call in one of the finest physicians in the world. He might give you the best treatment that the human mind after centuries of experience could conceive. But he must give time for the healing wings of nature to assist in the restoration. The finest surgeon who ever wielded a knife cannot in 1 day restore a patient who needs a major operation. Somebody standing on the sidelines at the end of the second day might say: "Why, he is not doing any good. Why do you not call in Dr. Quack? Why do you not call in Dr. Hoover, who produced 20-cent wheat and 10-cent corn and 5-cent cotton?"

They started to hang a judge out in the midwest about a year ago, someone stated here on the floor of the House, because a foreclosure was started when corn was selling at 10 cents a bushel. Corn has been selling for around 40 cents a bushel since this program started. Does anyone want to go back to the wheatless days, the meatless meals, and the sleepless nights of the Hoover administration? I do not think the program is perfect, but I do appeal in all good conscience to all of you. Practically all farm prices are higher than a year ago.

I apologize to the gentleman from Ohio. He and I are good friends. He is a great friend of the farmer. I want him to stop and think. I want him to use his fine energy to help build a program. I was just trying to call his attention to what is being done to work out a problem for agriculture which will cure a condition that has existed for years. Strong men do not leap from birth to full-bloom manhood in a day, except in mythology. It is going to take careful work, with the assistance of everyone who has sympathy. If there is anything wrong I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX], who is interested in farming and who I know is interested in promoting the welfare of the farmer, to go down and make suggestions. They will make mistakes. Let us work out a program. Let us get together and pull to lift the farmer out of this condition. If you look over the fields of the East and the South and West you will not find them in perfect condition, but they are in much better condition than they were a year ago.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I think one of the peculiar differences between the program they are trying to work out now and the one that has been adverted to over here is the fact they go back and consult the farmers under this program. That was not done under the old program.

They appeared at the hearings we had before our committee. They were consulted. We had a meeting of cattlemen and dairymen from all over the United States. They came and sat in conference in the rooms of the Committee on Agriculture and they asked for this bill. Mr. Petrie and the Secretary of Agriculture said that they would not work out a program until they had consulted with the cattlemen and dairymen. They are trying to do teamwork.

One of the reasons that the wheat and cotton programs have been successful so far is the fact that they have county and community committees, and all of the administrative details practically were worked out by those committees. If a farmer was not satisfied with his allotment, he went before a committee of his neighbors and argued the matter out. The committee usually did about the right thing. The program was taken back to the grass roots. That is Jeffersonian democracy, if I know anything about it, and if these men will be patient, I think some of the programs will have to be changed, but we will get somewhere, and we are getting somewhere. You go out in the fields of the West and South and in the East and look the actual farmer in the eye and ask him if he wants to go back to the debacle we had just before this last session and you will be met with a chorus of nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. In my home county, containing only 17½ townships, the farmers will receive over $300,000 on account of the reduction in the production of hogs and the reduction in farm acreage.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. That is true everywhere. Benefits are being had, the money is going out, and the men are getting more than they would if they did not have an organized program.

The farm-machinery people reduced their production to the demand. The automobile people reduced their production to the demand. If they had not, automobiles would be selling for $100 apiece. If they were sold at that price and plows at $10 apiece, and other prices in proportion, we could then afford to have cheap farm products, but a planless agriculture in the face of a planned industry will condemn the American farmer to poverty. Take it, if you want it. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have been desiring to say a word, perhaps on behalf of the consumer, but particularly for the manufacturer. Evidently this $150,000,000 is now to be borne by the general taxpayer, since the dairy and cattle interests object to paying this tax and are to demand assistance therein.

These processing taxes are apparently not going to succeed. If it cannot succeed in the case of cotton, where can it be successful? I wish to report what a manufacturer of certain cotton goods told me recently. When I asked him about the situation, he replied, in effect: "A year ago cotton was selling for about 6 cents a pound. Then we went off the gold standard and there was a natural increase in the price to approximately 11 cents per pound, which is what the farmer is now receiving. Then a processing tax was imposed and the cost to the manufacturer of cotton goods rose to about 16 cents a pound. The N.R.A. then came along and the cost to the manufacturer again rose, according to the fineness of the material produced, but in many cases to not less than 21 cents."

In consequence there has been a very large increase in the price of cotton goods to the ultimate consumer. The figures which I have quoted are those given me by a manufacturer, and I doubt whether they can be successfully challenged, for he knew what he was talking about.

Then I asked him about their present program, and he replied that they are now seeking to reach an agreement to curtail the manufacture of cotton by 25 percent. When the material was cheap the wheat farmers were accustomed to use a cotton bag and use it only once, for sanitary reasons. But now they cannot afford them and are going to use paper bags, and once they start doing that they will not return to cotton ones. Hence, a little later we shall hear from the cotton farmers again when they begin to realize that the volume of their sales is being adversely affected. And we are all now beginning to realize that the general public is, after all, to bear most if not all of these processing taxes.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has referred to Mr. Hoover's plan and the large expenditure of money made in taking off the market the surplus crops at the behest of the farmer. Of course, the theory underlying the processing tax plan is that these advances by the Government are supposed to be repaid, through the medium of the tax, by the consumer, who had been buying too cheaply and was supposed to be willing to stand the increased cost. But now we find that after all the processor has for various reasons been unable to pass this tax on to the consumer after all and is in effect making the producer pay it. We are faced with quite a different situation than what was promised. By next year we may very well compare the losses under the Hoover plan with this seemingly complete failure of the processing-tax scheme.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Gladly; yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Under the so-called "Dr. Hoover administration", many people were forced to use cotton sacks for bed sheets and towels, too, were they not? We do not want that condition to exist again.

Mr. GIFFORD. We had an actually prosperous time, compared with what we would have been having lately, I may say to the gentleman, if it were not for the loans and gifts of billions by which the Government has been bolstering up the country the past year.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Gladly.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman know that the number of families on relief today is just as large as it was a year ago?

Mr. GIFFORD. I will say to the gentleman that on the appropriation of this $950,000,000 more that is to be given away in any manner in which the President may see fit, the public may come to a realization of the fact that something very artificial and expensive is being resorted to in order to make the people believe that we are, in fact, more prosperous than we were a year ago.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Speaker, the difficulty of adjusting agriculture seems to be unsurmountable. I rise to make some observations on what was said on the floor this afternoon in regard to this resolution.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] is opposed to a processing tax unless the Government fixes the price of the product effected at a cost of production plus a small profit. If a profitable price was fixed to the farmer, the surplus he would produce would be tremendous. Mr. TRUAX must be for some surplus control program and he should suggest one.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD] wants to be assured that this bill does not provide for a processing tax, or at least not one as suggested at 5 cents per pound on butter fat.

We produced last year over one and three quarter billion pounds of butter fat in the United States, and 5 cents per pound tax on this would yield in 1 year eighty-seven and one half million dollars. There is no danger of such a tax, and this bill does not provide for any tax.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] takes a fall out of Mr. Wallace. He states that Mr. Wallace advertises seed corn that will produce one fifth more corn per acre at $6 per bushel, and thereby increase production, and at the same time the Secretary of Agriculture asks the farmer to reduce acreage of corn in order to produce less corn. If Mr. Wallace can produce seed that will produce on 8 acres as much as we can raise with common seed on 10 acres, he is the greatest benefactor that the farmers have and should return to his farm and do more work along the line of seed breeding. Why plow, seed, cultivate, harvest, and pay taxes on 10 acres if 8 will produce as much? Mr. Wallace could soon place the farmers under the N.R.A. or under the Conners 30-hour-a-week labor bill.

Many speakers dwelled on the insane policy of destroying food as it is supposed to be practiced, especially under the hog-reduction program. The Government bought 6,000,000 pigs and received every runty, sickly and thin pig that was not fit for food. They purchased 100,000 brood sows that had to be within 1 month of farrowing. The State law of Minnesota prohibits the sale of food from any animal that is within 1 month of producing its young. Hogs so destroyed are mostly responsible for the accusation made against the Government.

This bill does not provide nor will the Government destroy any cattle that are fit for food. How the $100,000,000 appropriated in this bill is going to be used toward the reduction of cattle is in the hands of a committee selected by the cattle breeders themselves.

I am going to vote for this bill. The $50,000,000 appropriated under the La Follette amendment in this bill provides for the purchase of dairy products and beef to be fed to the needy. This should be an outright appropriation and not be replaced by a processing tax. The Government should feed the poor and not expect the farmer to do it. A portion of the $100,000,000 available for the purchasing of cattle should be used to eliminate tubercular- and bangs-affected cattle. The Government should also bear this expense as a health measure and no processing tax should be levied.

If the farmers through their committee of five decide to eliminate more cattle, and they should, they therefore should not expect any more public help, but should raise the necessary funds by means of a processing tax.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WEST of Ohio). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman from Texas made a personal attack upon me [laughter], and I desire to be recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. TRUAX. I repeat that the gentleman from Texas made a personal attack upon me by inferring and stating that I had been inactive and had opposed the President's program and did nothing but bawl.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman makes that statement I must insist that the language I used be read, because I claim that no such statement was made.

Mr. TRUAX. I demand that the language be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the request comes too late.

Under the rules of the House if a Member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the Member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

Other business having intervened, the Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman's request comes too late.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I made the request before any further business had intervened and was not recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] endeavored to secure recognition on a question of personal privilege but did not request at the time that the words objected to be taken down.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio made the statement he arose to a point of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The raising of a question of personal privilege involving words spoken in debate does not give the Member affected the right to recognition on that question unless the words objected to be taken down at the time. The gentleman's remedy was to have demanded that the words be taken down at the time they were spoken.

Mr. TRUAX. I do not object to the story of the gentleman from Texas about the old brindle cow. During my farming experience I have always found that the jackass can bray louder than any other animal on the place.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman certainly qualifies.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I now rise to a point of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has not qualified to make the point at this time.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

During the counting Mr. TRUAX withdrew his point of no quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

The sum of $3,000 of the appropriation "Contingent expenses, House of Representatives: Folding documents, 1933 (03114)" is continued and made available for the same purposes during the fiscal year 1934.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 11, after the words "year 1934", insert a new section:

"SEC. 2. That section 15 (d) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (Public, No. 10, 73d Cong.) is hereby amended by adding thereto the following: 'Provided, That where such competing commodity by reason of custom, practice, and/or utility is not in substantial competition with a basic commodity or where by reason of custom, practice, or use of such competing commodity in an industry or industries, there will be no excessive shift in consumption within the meaning of this act, within a State or States, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to return the entire benefit of such compensatory tax to the purchasers and users thereof.'"

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, let us get down to the practical operations of this bill and the processing tax. The operation of this tax on jute bags for the benefit of the cotton-producing industry is working an injustice to producers of many products. I refer to the marketing of potatoes in the State of Idaho; also to peas, beans, barley, and all kinds of products that are using jute bags.

The law should be repealed or modified; and, if my amendment is adopted, users of jute bags will be benefited by the refund of the tax collected to the users of jute bags in marketing their products.

The unfairness of the tax on bags used by other branches of agriculture than cotton is further accentuated by the fact that the cotton industry has been exempted from a tax on the jute which is used for bagging cotton itself. The jute regulations also were so drafted that burlap bags used for wool were exempted. Cotton bagging or cotton bags for wool had never been used in the past for either of these purposes, and the administration quite properly gave recognition to this fact in the regulations. Growers of grain, beans, potatoes, onions, and nuts can see no reason for not being given the same recognition. The facts relating to their use of burlap bags are identical with those of cotton and wool. California farmers on the average use annually about 44,000,000 burlap bags for purposes for which cotton bags has never been used. The processing tax on the jute used in their construction constitutes under present economic conditions a very real burden. The tax total for California alone is close to $900,000 per year. It touches practically every branch of agriculture practiced in this State.

We do not use cotton sacks in Idaho; we use gunny sacks or jute bags, and it costs us $6.36 for every carload of potatoes we send out. In presenting the facts with reference to the effect of the jute-processing tax on the cost of marketing potatoes, peas, and vegetables in the States west of the Rocky Mountains, I submit the following letter from the State commissioner of agriculture for Idaho and a resolution by the Idaho State Grange. For the consideration of the Members of the House I desire to present the facts outlined in the application of the California Farm Bureau Federation submitted to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, for the elimination of the processing tax on burlap bags used for agricultural commodities, to be included in my remarks.

STATE OF IDAHO,
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Boise, March 29, 1934.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Referring to your letter with reference to the jute tax placed on potato bags, will say that we are very glad indeed that you are carrying on your efforts with the Department of Agriculture to remove the tax which at the present time our potato growers are paying.

It does not seem possible that anyone could talk themselves into feeling that this tax is just, even if it does benefit somebody in some other part of the country. There would be just as much sense in saying that to place a tax on the wool bag would help to relieve the cotton farmer by paying him more for his cotton and thus make a better customer for the manufacturer and grower of wool. That kind of argument does not make sense when it gets back here to our growers in the West who are sacking their onions, beans, and potatoes and placing them on the market, knowing full well that they are paying a heavy penalty just because someone somewhere thinks it should be done. If we have to be a party to raising a surplus or bonus to be paid the cotton industry, or any other industry, why should an item like our potato bags be singled out from all of the rest of the things we buy?

I know full well that I am not trying to convince you with any argument that I may produce. I know very well that you have many arguments that beat some of the things I might mention. I know that you are whole-heartedly in sympathy with our growers here in Idaho, just as I am, and are trying in every way that you can to relieve them.

I am still hoping that through your efforts, along with others whom I know are trying, that we may finally get this tax removed.

Thanking you very much for your personal efforts, I am,

Very truly yours,

F. LEE JOHNSON,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

IDAHO STATE GRANGE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Caldwell, Idaho, April 4, 1934.

IDAHO STATE GRANGE RESOLUTION FORWARDED TO SECRETARY WALLACE

Whereas the United States Government, on December 1, 1933, imposed a processing tax upon all jute bags used in the United States as containers of potatoes, onions, and beans, ranging in amount from $15.65 to $22.94 per thousand, thereby placing an unjust, unfair, and unreasonable burden upon the farming interests of the State of Idaho, costing them up to the present time better than $100,000, and which will, if continued, cost them approximately $275,000 per annum; and

Whereas, without any notice or warning whatever, these taxes were imposed upon jute products, to the serious detriment of both the grower and shipper of Idaho beans, onions, and potatoes; and

Whereas the farmers of Idaho are today paying a heavy tariff upon all jute shipped into the United States, also a processing tax upon all cotton goods used by them; and

Whereas the farmers of Idaho have never used cotton bags, except in a small way, in the marketing of their products, and cannot use cotton bags in any quantity except for small consumer packages and on which jute bags cannot be used; and

Whereas jute bags are in no way competitive to cotton as the ordinary containers for potatoes, onions, and beans; and

Whereas the farmers of Idaho are today paying the heaviest freight rates upon their commodities moving to market of any like farming community in the United States; and

Whereas the farm commodities of the State of Idaho during the past few years have sold at prices averaging less than the cost of production, particularly all crops that are affected by the tax on jute products; and

Whereas there is no direct or indirect benefit received by the farmers of Idaho from the moneys that they have paid out as a result of this processing tax; and

Whereas the potato, onion, or bean industry has never received any crop advances or advances for abandoned acreage, nor do they anticipate requesting any such assistance; and

Whereas the tax upon jute products is only another unjust, unfair, and unreasonable burden added to those now being borne by the farmers of the State of Idaho, and further deprives them of any opportunity that they might have to recover from the depressed condition of their industry: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the executive committee of the Idaho State Grange, in regular meeting this 31st day of March 1934, protest the processing tax now imposed upon jute bags used in marketing of our commodities, and respectfully urge the United States Government, through the United States Department of Agriculture, to give the producers of potatoes, onions, and beans relief from these unfair, unjust, and unreasonable taxes by removing the processing tax upon all bags used in the marketing of these commodities.

BEFORE THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

Application for the elimination of the processing tax on burlap bags used for agricultural commodities from jute regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, effective December 1, 1933.

APPLICATION OF THE CALIFORNIA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Interests represented by applicant

The California Farm Bureau Federation is an incorporated, voluntary, mutual, nonprofit association, representing all agricultural interests within the State of California. It is organized for the purpose of protecting the economic, social, and educational interests of farmers. It is nonpartisan in its viewpoint, and is equally sympathetic toward all branches of agriculture.

Regulation complained of

On December 1, 1933, Mr. H. A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, in pursuance of the authority vested in him by section 15 (d) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, approved May 12, 1933, imposed a processing tax on jute fabric amounting to 2.9 cents per pound on the first domestic processing of jute fabric into bags. The reason given for imposing this tax was "that the payment of the processing tax upon cotton is causing, and will cause, to the processors thereof disadvantages in competition from jute fabric and jute yarn by reason of excessive shifts in consumption between such commodities or products thereof."

Since the date this tax was first levied, numerous complaints of unfair discrimination against them have been filed with us by growers of various agricultural commodities. These farmers have requested us to present their views to the administration in the hope that either it would grant immediate relief on the basis of the facts herein presented or would set a further hearing in this matter on the Pacific coast at an early date.

Position of the California Farm Bureau Federation

We should like at the outset to state our position clearly, so that the statements which we shall make later will not be subject to misinterpretation. Western agriculture is cognizant of the splendid and heroic work being accomplished by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. It is a believer in and a supporter of the principles which the administration is putting into effect. The comments and such criticism as we shall offer are intended to be helpful and are made with the hope that they may pave the way to a fair and speedy settlement of what has developed into a vexatious and embarrassing situation for all supporters of the recovery program.

The California Farm Bureau Federation desires to cooperate with the administration to the fullest extent possible. The working out of an equitable application of the jute processing tax is necessary to the success of the cotton plan. In order for the latter to be successful, the fair treatment of growers of other commodities must be considered in accomplishing this end.

The effect of the compensatory jute tax on western agriculture

The compensatory tax based on jute fabric manufactured into bags has imposed a great burden upon farmers in the Pacific Northwest without corresponding benefits to the cotton branch of the industry. Barley, beans, grain sorghums, nuts, oats, onions, peas, potatoes, rice, and wheat are all grown in large quantities throughout this area, and are now and always have been moved in burlap bags. Bulk handling of these commodities is not extensively practiced in the rural sections of the Pacific Northwest, and it is, therefore, customary to sell these agricultural products in burlap bags, usually of 100-pound capacity or greater. The selling price of grain, beans, rice, etc., is based on the delivery of the product in a bag, and in those rare cases where the commodities are delivered in bulk, the cost of a suitable burlap bag is deducted from the current price paid the farmer.

The producers of each and every one of these commodities has suffered from extreme price recessions during the past 4 years, and the amount of economic recovery to date in many instances is much less than that now attained by cotton growers.

The table on page 3 shows the farm prices paid during the past 5 years for the principal California farm commodities using bag containers. It shows that for each of these commodities the price recovery is far from being accomplished. Table I shows, further, that the cost of the customary burlap container has been so increased by the so-called "compensatory tax" that it now costs practically the same or more than it did during the year of highest farm prices during the period in question. There is, therefore, no justification for the assessing of this tax on the ground of ability to pay, nor is there any legal ground within the Agricultural Adjustment Act on which this exaction may be based.

The processing tax on jute applicable to bags used for the agricultural commodities named in table I is unreasonable, unfair, and unjust. Section 5 (d) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which is the authority relied upon by the administration for the levying of this tax, states: "The Secretary of Agriculture shall ascertain from time to time whether the payment of the processing tax upon any basic commodity is causing or will cause to the processors thereof disadvantages in competition from competing commodities by reason of excessive shifts in consumption between such commodities or products thereof."

Regardless of the relationship between the price of cotton and burlap, these agricultural commodities have always moved in burlap bags, if the quantity exceeded 50 pounds. Obviously, since cotton bags never have been used for these crops (except in an insignificant amount for experimental purposes) regardless of the extremely low cotton prices which have obtained in the past, there can be no justification for assuming that there has been or will be a shift in consumption resulting from a process tax being placed upon cotton. The application of a tax on bags used for these purposes is, therefore, a clear violation of the intent of the act, and merely results in burdening agriculture with higher costs of production.

Farmers growing most of the commodities named are not receiving Government assistance, except in a limited way; and, since there have been no important price recoveries, these growers find themselves in the dangerous position of being between a nether stone of rising production costs and a stationary upper stone of farm-commodity prices. They are not only unwilling to pay the tax because it is unfairly assessed, but also because they are unable to do so. Some relief is being sought through the reuse of old bags. The majority of growers, however, are forced through trade and operating practices to use new bags, and for them there is no escape from the tax.

[1] Estimated.

It is impossible under present economic conditions for these farmers to pass this tax on. They are faced with the problem of overproduction or failure of markets to absorb normal amounts. They are in most cases getting little if anything above out-of-pocket costs. This tax is, therefore, a direct levy upon returns to growers which are already insufficient to maintain economic existence.

Agricultural relief cannot be accomplished by taxing one portion of agriculture in order to assist another. Since cotton bags have never been used on the Pacific coast (nor elsewhere in the United States in recent years for containers of the commodities mentioned), a compensatory tax levied on burlap bags used for agricultural purposes is unreasonable, and in effect becomes merely a revenue tax placed upon agriculture generally for the benefit of one group, namely, cotton.

The tax on burlap bags used by agriculture is not legally assessed. It is levied in direct violation of the clear and unmistakable intent of the act. It reduces the purchasing power of farmers without widening the market for his products. This is clearly in contradiction of the purposes plainly stated in section 2 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which are to establish and maintain such balance between production and consumption of agricultural commodities and such marketing conditions therefor as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period. (August 1909–July 1914.)

The unfairness of the tax on bags used by other branches of agriculture than cotton is further accentuated by the fact that the cotton industry has been exempted from a tax on the jute which it uses for bagging cotton. The jute regulations also were so drafted that burlap bags used for wool were exempted. Cotton bagging or cotton bags for wool had never been used in the past for either of these purposes, and the administration quite properly gave recognition to this fact in the regulations. Growers of grain, beans, potatoes, onions, and nuts can see no reason for not being given the same recognition. The facts relating to their use of burlap bags are identical with those of cotton and wool. California farmers, on the average, use annually about 44,000,000 burlap bags for purposes for which cotton has never been used. The processing tax on the jute fabric used in their construction constitutes under present economic conditions a very real burden. The tax totals for California alone close to $900,000 per year. It touches practically every branch of agriculture practiced in this State. Table II shows the number used and the tax burden by commodities.

Factors governing the use of jute bags

As has already been pointed out, jute bags have been used in the Pacific Northwest exclusively for bagging certain agricultural commodities. The reasons for the choice of burlap are not the same for each commodity, but they all point to the conclusion that there has been and will be no shift from jute to cotton unless the so-called "compensatory tax" is increased to such a point as to actually make the use of jute impossible.

Each of the principal commodities will now be considered.

Barley, rice, grain sorghums, and wheat are almost exclusively handled in burlap bags throughout the Pacific Northwest. There is a small amount of bulk handling, but even in this case, as previously mentioned, the selling price is based on the cost of placing the grain in bags by the purchaser. Grain in bags is customarily stored in high piles in warehouses. It is necessary, due to trade practices, to sample each sack. For this purpose a metal tryer is inserted through the fabric. When the tryer is removed the hole in a burlap bag tends to close up without tearing. A cotton bag, on the other hand, will not stand this practice unless made of exceptionally heavy fabric.

TABLE II.—Number of burlap bags used annually by California agriculture and the present jute processing-tax burden on commodities using burlap exclusively

[1] Seconds.

Suitable cotton bags are now, and always have been, too costly for this purpose. Piles made of cheap cotton bags would soon break down due to leakage under the usual operating practices.

The cost of a cotton bag capable of standing customary uses would be about double the cost of a satisfactory burlap bag.

Jute grain bags are not reused for rice, wheat, barley, or beans, and since they are considered as part of the cost of production, it is essential that as cheap a bag be used as possible. Bags of grain when exported are deliberately "bled" after loading into the ship so that the cargo will load better. Obviously only cheap bags could be used under such circumstances.

The same size and weight of bag is used for barley, rice, and wheat and grain sorghum. It is of a special size (22 by 36 inches) and made of 10-ounce burlap. It holds from 100 to 120 pounds, depending upon the commodity. This size of bag was developed through long experience because it lent itself more readily to piling than the sizes used for other commodities. Only burlap bags have ever been used for these commodities.

Onions in this section are customarily moved in burlap bags of two sizes—18 by 32 inches and 24 by 37 inches, made of 5½- or 8-ounce burlap, and will hold 50 pounds and 100 pounds of onions, respectively. No cotton bags are used for this purpose.

Potatoes also require a cheap bag, as the container is considered a part of the cost of production. The weight of the container is deducted from the gross weight in determining the price paid for all agricultural commodities. Except for a very small quantity of cotton bags used experimentally, jute bags have been and are now being used exclusively. For this purpose a bag 23 by 36 inches, made of 8-ounce burlap, and capable of holding 100 pounds of potatoes is the customary container.

For walnuts and almonds, burlap bags made of 10-ounce burlap, 30 by 40 inches, having a capacity of 100 pounds, are used almost exclusively. A few bags of a smaller size have been used, mainly for advertising purposes or as holiday specials, but these also have been made of burlap. No cotton bags are used for nuts.

Peas and oats move almost entirely in second-hand burlap bags. Cotton bags are never used for this purpose. A processing tax on new bags, however, has increased the cost of second-hand bags materially. These crops are, therefore, also affected.

Bags used for feeds (mixed and mill) are ordinarily made of 9- or 10-ounce burlap, 23 by 36 inches, having a capacity of 100 pounds. A few of these bags are made of cotton where it is desired to use a fancy brand. For the usual run of mill feeds, however, the burlap bag is used almost exclusively, as it is entirely satisfactory and always has been a cheaper container than a suitable bag made of cotton. It will be noted that in this category the size of the bag is different from that used for other commodities which used jute exclusively.

Fertilizers ordinarily move in 9-ounce burlap bags, 21 by 36 inches, having a capacity of 100 pounds.

Alfalfa meal is handled exclusively in burlap bags constructed of 9½-ounce burlap, 30 by 45 inches, having a capacity of 100 pounds.

A summary of data relating to the use of bags by the agricultural industry in California is given in table III, following:

The use of bags in California as indicated in table III appears to be similar to that in other parts of the country for the commodities considered. The use of burlap bags for handling grain is, however, a method peculiar to the Pacific Northwest. In other parts of the country, the other commodities named used burlap bags for the same reasons as they are used in California.

Character of relief sought

The definition of "bags" contained in the jute regulations complained of herein is unreasonable, unjust, and discriminatory to the entire agricultural industry, excepting growers of wool and cotton. We, therefore, earnestly urge the administration to grant relief to growers of other agricultural commodities in one of the following ways, or in such other manner as the administration in its judgment may deem advisable:

(1) By removing the 2.9 cents per pound processing tax on all jute bag containers having a nominal capacity of 50 pounds or more;

(2) Abate the processing tax on both cotton and burlap bags having a nominal capacity of 50 pounds or more;

(3) Remove the processing tax on burlap bags having a capacity of 50 pounds or more when used as containers of alfalfa meal, barley, beans, fertilizer, grain sorghum, nuts, onions, potatoes, rice, and wheat.

The first suggestion will grant relief to those growers of agricultural commodities who do not use cotton bags without prejudicing the use of cotton bags except to a very limited extent. It is unreasonable to penalize farmers who use burlap bags exclusively merely because 1 percent to a maximum of 25 percent, in some cases, of the total bags manufactured of a certain size happen to be made of cotton, particularly when in most of the cases the cotton bag would be used, regardless of the price of burlap. Likewise, it is unjust to farmers to penalize them in order to hold for cotton so small a portion of the total bag business, if this business has been obtained due to cotton prices being so low as to actually fail to pay costs of production. The loss of such business to burlap could not be deemed an "excessive shift."

In order to present a broader picture of the effect of suggestion no. 1 we have prepared a tabulation showing the total number of cotton and burlap bags used in the United States having a capacity of 50 pounds or greater. While in some instances it has been necessary to estimate the quantity of bags of a certain size used for a commodity, these estimates are usually of such small magnitude as not to affect materially the accuracy of the statement.

Out of approximately 560,000,000 bags, less than 20 percent as a maximum could possibly be considered as being competitive. Assuming for the moment that they are all competitive, then it appears that the administration has levied a tax on agriculture of over $11,000,000 in order to collect a tax of $2,000,000 on bags which might be deemed taxable under the law. It is also a fact that included in this $11,000,000 of tax is a levy of over $4,500,000 on burlap bags which never were in any manner or degree competitive with cotton.

In arriving at the $2,182,600 tax on so-called "competitive bags", the tax was applied to all cotton bags in the class. Obviously, many cotton bags are used for purposes for which burlap is not suitable and these are, therefore, noncompetitive and should be eliminated. A true picture would likely show that little over 10 percent of the bags listed are actually competitive. A $9 unjust tax should not be levied in order to collect $1 that may be due.

TABLE IV.—Amount of taxes collected on noncompetitive jute bags compared with amount collected on competitive cotton bags

[3] For the purpose of this table, the entire number of cotton bags sold are assumed to be competitive with burlap, although obviously a much smaller proportion should be used.
[4] Open mesh cotton bags are competitive with paper, but not burlap, so are excluded from table.
[5] Cotton and paper bags are used only for small containers.
[6] 98-pound and 140-pound bags only. No burlap 50-pound bags used for flour.

The second proposal is offered if, in the opinion of the administration, processors of the small percentage of cotton bags used for containers having a capacity of 50 pounds or more should be fully protected against any possible shift in consumption. Again, we insist that this should not be done at the expense of other branches of agriculture which use enormous quantities of burlap bags exclusively. Full protection for cotton processors can be obtained by abating the tax on the small quantity of cotton bags used in the classification of 50-pound capacity and over without jeopardizing the interests of cotton growers or other agricultural commodities.

The third suggestion will entirely meet the requirements of Pacific coast agriculture. It does not in any way injure the cotton interests or the working of the cotton plan. It fully complies with the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Section 15 (d) of the act does not specify the means of applying a compensatory processing tax. The suggestion merely goes one step further than the exemptions now permitted under present jute regulations, which defines bags as "bags are all bags less than 6 feet in length and less than 3 feet in width made from jute fabrics." We ask merely that the regulations be modified so as to properly exempt all those commodities which have been heretofore moved exclusively in jute containers. We are asking for California agriculture the same treatment that has been accorded to cotton and wool growers; namely, the recognition of the fact that where a commodity has moved practically 100 percent in jute containers in the past, it is entitled to be exempted from the payment of a compensatory tax on the grounds that there has been and will be no shift from the use of cotton to jute.

We most earnestly urge your careful consideration of the matters set forth in this application, together with the supplementary letters attached hereto from representative growers and handlers of various agricultural commodities. We ask that if possible immediate relief be granted by the removal of the tax on jute bags which are not now and never have been competitive with cotton bags, and that if this action is not possible without a hearing, that such hearing be granted at the earliest possible date and be held in San Francisco, so that western agriculture may appear and be fully heard.

Dated at Berkeley, Calif., this 31st day of March 1934.

Respectfully submitted.

CALIFORNIA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
By R. W. BLACKBURN, President.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed, was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, this day by unanimous consent was set aside for the consideration of District of Columbia business. In view of the time that has been taken up in the consideration of House Joint Resolution 345, I think we ought to have another day, sometime next week. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday of next week be set aside, and that the day be devoted for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday of next week be dispensed with, and that the day be devoted to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to doing away with the business in order on Calendar Wednesday, but I object to the other part of the request.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

THIS IS AN HONEST, DEMOCRATIC, AND AMERICAN METHOD OF ELECTING OUR PRESIDENT.—JOHN G. CARLISLE

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain quotations from Mr. John G. Carlisle.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 136 proposes a plan which John G. Carlisle declared to be an "honest, democratic, and American method" of electing a President.

The purpose of these remarks is to present the fundamental differences between the existing and the proposed plan of electing the President. I shall also briefly quote from Mr. Carlisle's exposition of this problem.

ELECTORS USELESS

Under the electoral-college system, the people of each State vote for Presidential electors, who, in turn, act as an intermediate agency in electing the President.

The Presidential elector was provided by the Constitution with the intention that he should use his own free discretion in voting for the best possible man for President. It was not intended that his vote should be pledged in advance. Presidential electors of each State were free to vote independently or collectively, as they saw fit.

The electoral college was planned for a nonpartisan Government, at a time when there were no political parties as we know them today.

As soon as political parties developed, the system of unpledged electors was changed to electors pledged to the party which elected them.

Beginning with the fourth election in 1800 and ever since, all Presidential electors have been pledged in advance.

Deprived of any discretion as to how they should vote, the electors ceased to serve any useful purpose. For over 100 years we have continued to elect them, although they have ever since been a needless encumbrance of our election machinery.

They are not only needless, but, as our history has demonstrated, they are responsible for a good many of the uncertainties of Presidential elections. Instead of the popular election always settling the question as to who shall be President, sometimes the popular election is only the beginning of the uncertainties as to the election which at times have harassed the country.

THE UNIT VOTE

The electors are chosen by a plurality vote in each State.

The whole electoral vote of the State is cast for the plurality candidate, regardless of the size of his plurality, whether his vote, for instance, be 40 percent or 80 percent of the popular vote.

The plurality candidate, for instance, who receives only 40 percent of the popular vote receives 100 percent of the electoral vote. The votes of all persons in the State voting for minority candidates are disregarded in computing the result of the election on the final count at Washington.

In the average Presidential election of the last 60 years, over 45 percent of the voters of the country, being all those who voted for minority candidates in all the States, have been disregarded in computing the final results.

Not only are the minority votes disregarded, but the electoral votes represented by them are cast for their opponents.

Even if the minority voters in the State remain away from the polls, the electoral votes granted to the State on account of their residence therein are nevertheless counted in opposition to their wishes.

The electoral votes were divided, at least to some extent, in each of the first 11 Presidential elections. The practice of electing electors by the unit vote, or the general-ticket system, became firmly established in 1832 (with exceptions unnecessary to mention) and has been the universal practice since that time.

UNIT VOTE ADOPTED TO SUPPRESS MINORITY VOTES

The unit vote was a method adopted by the dominating political party in each State to prevent the minority parties in the State from having any voice in the selection of the President. This effort of dominant political parties to prevent minorities in the State from having a voice in the selection of a President was intense preceding the election of 1800, and subsequently developed into a universal practice.

The Tammany victory in New York in the spring of 1800 and the victory of the Jefferson Party in Pennsylvania forecast the election of Jefferson unless the system of selecting Presidential electors should be changed.

The Federalist leaders sought to forestall the election of Jefferson by bringing about a deadlock in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and thus prevent the people of Pennsylvania from having any voice in the election. They sought to change the system of selecting electors in New York from the general to the district system of election in order that Adams might secure part of the electoral votes of New York instead of Jefferson securing them all.

The Legislature of New Hampshire took away the right of the people to select their Presidential electors, and they themselves chose Federalist electors. In the election that followed the Jefferson State ticket won by a popular vote of 10 to 6, but the electors chosen by the Legislature all voted for Adams.

In Massachusetts, the Federalist legislature did away with the district system of selecting electors and caused them to be selected by general ticket to prevent Jefferson securing any of the electors.

In Virginia, the general assembly did away with the district system of election and provided for the general-ticket system in order to eliminate the possibility of Adams securing any electoral votes from Virginia.

In 1812, within about 1 week of election, the Legislature of New Jersey took away from the people the right to vote for Presidential electors, and themselves selected the electors in order to prevent the opposition party from securing any electors from that State.

Thus the origin of the unit-voting system was a deliberate purpose to deny all minorities a voice in the selection of a President.

STATE PARTIES PREVENT THE COUNTING OF MINORITY VOTES

The only Federal officials for whom the Constitution gave the people the right to vote were Representatives in Congress.

After a good many years the universal practice of permitting the people to vote for Presidential electors was established by the States.

It was over 50 years after the Constitution was adopted before the common practice of selecting Representatives by the general-ticket system was abolished. The dominant political parties in some States continued for that length of time to deny the minority parties within the State the right to be represented in Congress through the selection of Representatives in Congress by districts. Full reform of that practice was accomplished as a result of the Whig victory in 1840.

After the district system of selecting Representatives was established, it soon became a common practice for the State legislatures to gerrymander the congressional districts to deny minority parties in the State their proper representation in Congress. That practice has continued until this hour. It is a form of discreditable politics, which evinces a lack of good sportsmanship by dominant State parties. It is a manifest abuse of legislative power that is a menace to good government. The public has been so long subjected to this abuse of power that it has become unduly tolerant to its malign influence.

The selection of Presidential electors by the unit vote is the same kind of a political offense as gerrymandering. It is the abuse of power by majority groups in the States to serve their own ends and to deny to all minorities their proper representation in the selection of a President. There is no difference in morals or in good politics between denying a minority its just representation in the House through gerrymandering and in denying a minority its just representation in the selection of a President. It is a denial of the just right of the minority to participate in the final count of the election. It is a form of political piracy. It is a refusal to count the votes as cast. In each case it is an abuse of power by those in control. The unit-voting system forbids any just system of mathematics in computing the results and creates what George McDuffie, over a hundred years ago, declared to be "a system of false equations."

DENIAL OF REPRESENTATION

Electoral votes were given to the States on the fundamental principle of electoral votes in proportion to population. Thus, the electoral votes represent the people.

We translate popular votes into electoral votes in the State to give the various States a common unit in which to express themselves in the election of a President.

The electoral votes represent the whole population of the State, those of the minority as well as of the majority parties. The denial of any representation of the minority of the State in the final computation of the result at Washington is a denial of representation, the fundamental principle on which our Government is supposed to be founded.

The minority in the State have as much right to be represented in the electoral college as in the House of Representatives through the election of Members by districts.

After the original struggle to deny minority representation began, it was soon found not practicable for one State to permit minority representation when that was denied in the other States. Thus all the States, through the necessity of adopting the bad example, were forced under the general-ticket system.

I present an illustrative table demonstrating George McDuffie's statement that the unit-voting system is "a system of false equations." The illustration assumes a State with 700,000 voters and 10 electoral votes.

Comparison of methods of computing State votes on final count under present and proposed plans

ELECTORAL-COLLEGE PLAN

Vote for leading candidate	Percent popular vote	Popular vote	Electoral vote	Minority votes disregarded
1. Unanimous	100	700,000	10	None
2. Majority (2 or more candidates)	60	420,000	10	280,000
3. Plurality (3 or more candidates)	40	280,000	10	420,000

PROPOSED PLAN

1. Unanimous	100	700,000	10	None
2. Majority	60	420,000	6	None
3. Plurality	40	280,000	4	None

From the above table it will be observed that the leading candidate, whether he received 100, 60, or 40 percent of the popular vote, would receive the same 10 electoral votes. In one case no minority votes would be disregarded; in the second case 280,000 minority votes would be disregarded; and in the third case 60 percent of all the popular votes, or 420,000, would be disregarded.

Under the proposed plan no votes would be disregarded, and each candidate would receive the number of electoral votes to which his popular votes entitled him; no more, no less.

UNIT VOTE FAVORS GROUP CONTROL

Some ill consequences of the unit-voting system are manifest. One effect is the inducement it offers for group, sectional, and minority control of the Government.

The Presidential election is now a contest of political parties to secure 265 electoral votes. The other 264 are relatively unimportant if the other 265 votes are secured. These 265 votes are secured through plurality votes in each of the States which in the aggregate have that many votes. On the average, as measured by the last election, those 265 electoral votes come from States which have a little over 20,000,000 of the Nation's 40,000,000 voters.

A majority of the popular votes in those States represent less than 26 percent of the voters of the country, or a little over 10,000,000 voters. Thus, 10,000,000 voters representing a little over one fourth of the voters of the Nation actually cast the effective votes that elect the President. The other votes of the Nation are either minority votes or majority votes cast in States where unnecessary to the election.

In cases where there may be three or more candidates a plurality vote might be as low as 40 percent or less of the vote of the Nation. A plurality vote in the States having 265 electoral votes in that event would be less than 8,500,000 voters.

By permitting a plurality group in States having one half of the electoral votes to elect the President, the system unnecessarily caters to group minority and sectional control of the election. Minority groups in the Nation may be given an importance in the final count virtually twice their actual voting numbers.

Under the plan proposed in House Joint Resolution 136, no such results can occur. Under this plan it would require a plurality of the whole Nation, and not simply in half of the States, to elect the President.

So, in any form the election may take by which less than half the voters of the Nation may select the President, this plan would, on the average, require twice as many popular votes as are necessary under the electoral-college system. In other words, this system is more conservative, more sound, stable, and just than the electoral-college system in assuring that the result of the election reflects the will of the Nation.

UNIT SYSTEM INDUCES FRAUD

Another ill consequence of the unit-voting system is the inducement it offers for fraud. The result of the election depends on securing the "doubtful States." The party who secures the plurality secures the whole vote of the State.

It may be that half or more of the popular votes are cast for minority parties, but the plurality candidate receives the total electoral vote.

A few hundred or a few thousand votes fraudulently secured may decide an election when a great State like New York with its 47 electoral votes, may have half of them taken away from the minority, or a great State like Ohio with its 26 electoral votes may have half of them taken away from the minority and given to the majority.

The unearned vote thus secured, as a result of fraud, would be the number of electoral votes represented by the total minority votes in that State.

Under the system of dividing the electoral votes as proposed in House Joint Resolution 136, the inducement to fraud is relatively nonexistent.

In the last Presidential election the average electoral vote represented about 70,000 voters. As the vote would be divided in exact proportion to the popular vote, using two points beyond the decimal in the interest of accuracy for that purpose, a contest involving 10,000 fraudulent votes, say in a State with 20 electoral votes, would mean a contest over one seventh of 1 electoral vote, instead of a contest over the whole 20 votes, as under the electoral-college system.

Thus, under the present system a fraud of 10,000 votes may secure 20 electoral votes, or even 47 electoral votes. Under the proposed system a fraud of 10,000 votes would involve only one seventh of 1 electoral vote, and ordinarily would be insignificant in determining the result of an election.

DOUBTFUL STATES

Another ill consequence of the electoral-college system is its unwholesome concentration of the contest to win the doubtful States and thus win the unearned votes representing the minorities in those States. The whole intense compact of the contest is centralized on the doubtful States.

The certain States are comparatively on the side lines in the election. Whether the majority of the leading candidate there be 10 percent or 40 percent, 1,000 or 500,000, is immaterial.

The minority votes in all the States are disregarded and not computed in the ultimate result.

Under the system proposed in House Joint Resolution 136, the minority vote in every State would count in the final result, whether in Maine, Pennsylvania, Alabama, or Oregon, each voter could cast his ballot with the assurance that it would contribute to the ultimate result.

The contest for the Presidency would thus be everywhere instead of in the few doubtful States.

The political problem of parties would not be to carry a few doubtful States, but to win votes everywhere. Voters everywhere would participate and have their votes counted as cast.

DEADLOCKS; ELECTIONS IN THE HOUSE

The presidential electors are chosen by plurality votes, but a majority of the electors is necessary to elect a President. In the absence of a majority the election of the President occurs in the House of Representatives, where the election is confined to one of the three highest candidates.

In the election in the House the votes are taken by States, each State having only one vote, which is determined by a majority vote of the Representatives from that State.

In other words, in an election of the President in the House of Representatives the smallest is the equal of the largest State and every other State in selecting the President. The State with 300,000 inhabitants is equal in power with the State of New York with over 12,000,000.

As a majority of the States, 25, have only about 20 percent of the Members of the House of Representatives, it is physically possible for that number of Representatives to select a President against the will of the overwhelming majority of the membership of the House.

Manifestly an election would usually occur in the House of Representatives only where there are three or more candidates having electoral votes or where one of the three highest has died or is disqualified. It is fairly safe to assume that in all such cases the membership of the House would be divided between three or more parties, which would make it probable that no one party would control a majority of the State votes. In that event, the only chance to elect a President in the House is by securing votes by the Representatives of one party for the candidate of another party. Any such election is likely to involve cabal, intrigue, and scandal, such as accompanied the elections in the House in 1800 and 1824.

SUMMARY OF DIFFERENCES IN THE TWO PLANS

To summarize, the differences in the two plans are simple, plain, and important:

The electoral college requires the election of Presidential electors who uselessly encumber our election machinery. The proposed plan eliminates these useless electors and gives the people a direct vote.

The electoral-college plan, through its allotment of electoral votes to the States under the formula prescribed by the Constitution, preserves the relative strength, or voting rights, of each State in the Federal Government. The proposed plan likewise preserves the relative strength of the States.

The electoral-college system, through its unit vote, denies minority participation in the final count for the election of a President. It is a form of discreditable politics akin to gerrymandering, which is another form of denying the minority its just participation in the election of Representatives.

The proposed plan would end this discreditable mistreatment of minorities and give every candidate the proportion of the electoral votes of the States to which he is entitled, no more and no less.

The electoral-college plan needlessly creates deadlocks and throws the election of the President into the House of Representatives.

The proposed plan would eliminate deadlocks and make the election of a President in the House unnecessary except in the cases where the elected candidate subsequently dies or becomes disqualified, as provided for in the "lame duck" amendment.

The other provisions of the proposed plan are routine and incidental to carrying out the fundamental purposes of the system.

PREVIOUS ATTEMPTS AT ELECTORAL REFORM

There have been two great periods of attempts at electoral reform in this country. The first had its setting in the controversial election in the House of Representatives in 1824, and the second in the controversial election of 1876. Thomas Benton and George McDuffie were the leaders in the first effort, and Senator Oliver Morton, of Indiana, was the leader in the second effort.

Senator Morton stood second on the first ballot for the Republican nomination in the convention of 1876. He was a member of the Electoral Commission which decided the Hayes-Tilden contest. With great ability and tenacity he advocated the elimination of presidential electors and the division of State electoral votes through district selection, as I have heretofore quoted him in presentation of this problem to committees of the House.

Petty politics and sectional and partisan strife made each of these great efforts for electoral reform fruitless.

The need of electoral reform has been almost universally recognized for a hundred years. The statesmanship of the country has presented the rather disheartening spectacle of being unable to reform the system in the face of bitter contests arising out of its defects. Inertia and indifference have made reform impossible when the country, in the absence of any acute injury, is unconscious of the evils that lurk in the system.

As an archaic, crude, and absurd system of selecting the head of the Nation, the electoral-college system is probably without an equal in any popular government in the world.

Its crudeness, inequalities, injustices, and possibilities for a national calamity challenge American statesmanship now when no bitter strife is impending, to correct these manifest evils.

JOHN G. CARLISLE

John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, is rated as one of our outstanding statesmen of the last 50 years. He served here many years. He was three times Speaker of the House of Representatives, served at length in the Senate, and was Secretary of the Treasury under the last Cleveland administration. His experience, his ability and practical statesmanship will not be questioned.

I submit herewith an approval of this plan as stated by Mr. Carlisle shortly after retirement from the Cleveland Cabinet.

PLAN APPROVED BY CARLISLE

A constitutional amendment, providing simply that the President and the Vice President shall be chosen by the people of the several States, voting by ballot, on a day fixed by Congress, which shall be the same throughout the United States; that the electors in each State shall have the qualifications required for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature; that each State shall be entitled to a number of votes—to be called "Presidential", or "electoral", votes—equal to the number of its Senators and Representatives in Congress; and that, in ascertaining the result of the election each person voted for shall be entitled to have counted in his favor a number of the Presidential, or electoral, votes of each State corresponding to the proportion of the popular vote received by him in such State—this would not only secure uniformity and equality but would greatly simplify the proceedings and avoid nearly all the dangers incident to the existing system.

DIVISION OF STATE VOTE PLAINLY JUST AND FAIR

That each candidate should be entitled to the vote actually received in each State by the electors representing him is a proposition so plainly just and fair, not only to the candidate himself, but to the people who support him, that it ought to receive general assent. It is not suggested that the popular vote of the whole country should be consolidated, or aggregated, so that a majority, or plurality, of the whole number should be necessary to elect; but simply, that each State should control its own electoral or Presidential vote and divide it among the persons voted for, according to the expressed will of its own people, without reference to majorities, or pluralities, in other States. * * *

This can be done without impairing the rights of any State, or interfering with the legitimate interests of any citizen or political party.

Under such a plan the several States would retain all the powers that they now possess in respect to the election of a President and a Vice President, and that power would be exercised directly by the people, voting under such qualifications as should be prescribed by each State for itself.

STATE RIGHTS PRESERVED

* * * The two electors awarded to each State on account of its Representatives in the Senate are chosen by the people at large in the same manner as those awarded to it on account of its population. In this country, the people are the primary source of all political power, and their will, expressed in the form prescribed by the laws of the State, is the will of the State. It is apparent, therefore, that so far as the method of choosing the electors would be concerned, and so far as the equal power of the States as such, would be affected, the suggested amendment would make no change from the present practice, and, consequently, it cannot be justly said that any existing right of the States would be impaired.

ELECTION REGARDLESS OF STATE LINES IMPOSSIBLE, EVEN IF DESIRABLE

"Any attempt to disturb the compromises of the Constitution, by which the equality of the States in the Senate and in the election of President and Vice President was provided for, would provoke a controversy in which the merits of all other features of the proposed amendment would be entirely ignored; and, consequently, those who really desire to secure a reformation of what they regard as the most objectionable parts of the system must be content to leave all others as they now are."

DIVISION OF STATE ELECTORAL VOTES ESSENTIAL TO A REMEDY OF THE EVILS OF THE PRESENT SYSTEM

In my opinion, no amendment will afford a complete remedy for the evils now existing unless it shall provide for the distribution of the Presidential or electoral votes of each State among the persons voted for according to the number of popular votes actually received by each, and that a plurality of the Presidential or electoral votes shall elect. If the entire Presidential or electoral vote of a State should still be given to a single person merely because he received a majority or plurality of its popular votes, the very large and the so-called "doubtful" States would continue to exercise more than their proper share of political power and influence in the selection of candidates, and in the elections; and none of the existing temptations to resort to unusual or improper practices, in order to secure a majority or plurality of the popular vote in such States, would be removed.

MINORITY STRENGTH WRESTED FROM THEM AND TRANSFERRED TO THEIR OPPONENTS

The minorities not only have no representation in the electoral colleges but the political power, which rightfully belongs to them as citizens and qualified voters, is wrested from them and transferred to their opponents. Their votes are not merely lost, but, by reason of the interposition of a wholly useless body of electors, are actually counted for the candidate against whom they are cast. These are not, therefore, the ordinary cases in which minorities are justly required to submit to the will of majorities, or pluralities, but cases in which the minorities are compelled, in the final process of electing, to contribute their whole force to the success of their opponents.

DIVISION OF STATE VOTES WOULD END DEMORALIZING CONTESTS IN DOUBTFUL STATES

If the electoral votes of each State are distributed among the several persons voted for in proportion to the popular vote received by them, respectively, it will be just as important to secure a large vote in one State as in another; and the demoralizing contests for the control of the doubtful or "pivotal" States will not occur. A Democratic vote in the Republican State of Pennsylvania, or a Republican vote in the Democratic State of Texas, would be as valuable to the parties, respectively, as if it had been secured in the most doubtful State in the Union; and a vote for either party in a small State would be just as important as a vote in a large one. If such a provision as is here suggested had been in force in 1876–77, the controversies which arose in regard to the votes of Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina would have been of no practical importance, because their determination either way would have affected but a mere fraction of a Presidential or electoral vote in each State, and the result of the election would not have been involved. The rejection of all the disputed votes in the three States would not have defeated Mr. Tilden; and, consequently, there would have been no inducement to make partisan decisions in the local election tribunals, nor any ground for the fear of civil commotion, which disturbed the public mind and paralyzed business during the pendency of the proceedings. It seems that any proposed constitutional or legal provision which, without doing injustice to any part of the people, would insure the country against the recurrence of such a dangerous condition of affairs ought to receive at least the careful consideration of Congress and of the States; and, if rejected, something better should be proposed in its place.

PLURALITY VOTE SHOULD ELECT

The general American rule is that, in choosing public officers, a plurality controls; and the application of this rule to the election of a President and a Vice President is especially desirable, for the reason, among others, that it would almost certainly prevent the devolution of the election upon the House of Representatives, a contingency which is always to be apprehended under the operation of the present system. * * * The constitutional requirement, that the votes of a majority of the whole number of electors chosen shall be necessary to elect, has, twice in our history, made it the duty of the House of Representatives to choose a President, once before the adoption of the amendment of 1804, and once after. On both occasions the public mind was filled with the gravest apprehensions of danger to the peace of the country. At the election of 1824, which was held under the Constitution, as amended, General Jackson received a greater popular vote and more electoral votes than Adams, his strongest competitor, and, under the plurality rule, would have been legally chosen President; but the question was referred to the House of Representatives, and Jackson was defeated.

DEADLOCKS PREVENTED—HOUSE ELECTIONS UNNECESSARY

* * * The simplest and fairest way to prevent the election from being made by the House is to provide that a plurality of the Presidential or electoral votes shall be sufficient, and, as already intimated, this would be no departure from the common law of elections in this country. It is not only the rule in selecting State officials but also in choosing Presidential electors under the present system; but, after the electors have been chosen by pluralities in all the States, the rule or principle is changed and the electors can make no choice except by the concurrent votes of a majority of their whole number. * * *

ELECTORS ARE USELESS AGENTS

Electors are chosen by pluralities for the sole purpose of electing a President and a Vice President, and the propositions here made are simply that these useless agents shall be dispensed with and that the people themselves shall elect, by a plurality vote, but securing to the minorities in the States the right to be effectively represented according to their numbers. * * *

Dangerous defects of our electoral system

The existing provisions of the Constitution on this subject * * * are not only cumbersome and inconsistent with the democratic spirit of our institutions, but so imperfect in their details and so uncertain in their practical operation as to constitute a menace to the peace of the country at each recurring Presidential election, yet * * * we may be compelled to go on, without a change, until some catastrophe shall occur, which will either precipitate hasty and inconsiderate action, or prevent any action, because it has become too late to accomplish anything.

When the people have voted, and the result of the poll has been finally ascertained and declared, the question ought to be settled; but, under the present useless and cumbersome system, the greatest difficulties and dangers are encountered after the popular election has been held.

In no other country in the world would such a system have failed to produce civil dissensions of the most dangerous character; and we shall be fortunate indeed if, in view of the growing importance of the offices to be filled, we continue much longer to enjoy immunity from such discords. * * *

The electoral system, which, even according to its original design, was never consistent with our theory of government, is, in my opinion, the source of all the greatest dangers to which we are now subject. * * *

JUST CAUSE FOR DISSATISFACTION

In a free country, the will of the majority, or of a plurality—if such a rule has been adopted in advance—when constitutionally expressed in the form of a law, or in the selection of public officials, ought to govern; and the minority cannot rightfully complain when its votes are merely lost, or prove ineffective. But when they are transferred to, and counted for, the majority, as they are now in choosing electors, there is just cause for dissatisfaction. If this process were necessary, in order to make the final result of the election conform to the will of the actual majority of the people of the several States, there would be no just cause for complaint; but its tendency is to produce just the contrary effect, as shown by our whole experience under the system. It is, therefore, objectionable, in both form and substance. A majority, or plurality, of 1 in the popular vote of a State is just as effectual to give the entire electoral vote of that State to a single person as is a majority, or plurality, of a hundred thousand, or even a greater number, in another State. It can, therefore, happen that the result of an election will depend, not upon the majorities, or pluralities, received in all the States, or in a majority of them, but upon a bare majority, or plurality, received in a single State; and this has actually occurred more than once.

PRESENT SYSTEM IS AN INDUCEMENT TO FRAUD

The electoral system is not only unnecessary, and likely to defeat the will of the people of the several States in the selection of a President and Vice President, but as now conducted it affords many opportunities and offers great inducements for fraud and corruption in the prosecution of the contest, as well as in the ascertainment and declaration of the result. When the election of a candidate by the electoral colleges can be secured by the purchase or manipulation of a very few popular votes in what are called the doubtful or pivotal States, it is scarcely to be expected that the temptation to use improper means, if necessary, to influence public opinion in such States will be successfully resisted by those who are entrusted with the management of political campaigns. In fact, a comparatively small number of votes in any one of our great cities may determine the result in a whole State, and thus throw the State's entire electoral vote to one candidate; and this small vote, however improperly it may have been secured, may decide who is to be President of the Republic for 4 years.

DEMONSTRATED EVILS OF SYSTEM MAY BE REPEATED

* * * The severe test to which the temper of our people and the strength of our institutions were then subjected cannot be safely repeated, and yet, while the existing system is continued, we are liable to a recurrence of similar troubles at each Presidential election, under conditions not so favorable, perhaps, to the preservation of the public peace.

There is no good reason why these perilous obstructions should not be removed from our pathway and a plain and just method be adopted for ascertaining and declaring the choice of the people for the two most important offices in the Government. If there ever was a substantial reason for the intervention of electors, it has long since ceased to exist; and every consideration of justice, expediency, and political consistency demands that this antiquated remnant of European aristocracy should be eliminated from our system at the earliest possible day. * * *

I submit a copy of House Joint Resolution 136, introduced by me, with title heads I have inserted for the readers' convenience:

House Joint Resolution 136

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That an amendment is hereby proposed to the Constitution of the United States which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by three fourths of the legislatures of the several States. Said amendment shall be as follows:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. That the twelfth amendment of the Constitution of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'ARTICLE XII

"'ELECTORAL COLLEGE ABOLISHED

"'The electoral-college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States is hereby abolished.

"'DIRECT VOTE

"'The President and Vice President shall be elected by the people of the several States. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"'TIME OF ELECTION

"'Congress shall determine the time of such election, which shall be the same throughout the United States. Until otherwise determined by the Congress, such election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November of the year preceding the year in which the regular term of the President is to begin.

"'STATE STRENGTH RETAINED

"'Each State shall be entitled to a number of electoral votes equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress.

"'CERTIFICATES OF RESULTS

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with the amendment that I offered to House Joint Resolution 345, and to include therewith certain data.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC ORDER

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address delivered by a former Member of this House, ex-Gov. James Cox, at the Jefferson Day banquet.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by a former Member of the House, ex-Governor James M. Cox, of Ohio, at the Jefferson Day banquet, Dayton, Ohio, May 12, 1934:

Our economic and governmental situation concerns every household in the land. It is a subject of such intimate interest that not a politically partisan word or thought should be expressed about it.

We must not forget what brought it about. It has not been created by the deliberate plans of public officers or laymen. The measures dealing with it are the best that could be devised in the emergency. We hope that it is the way out of chaos into a more contented and prosperous national life.

Its preliminaries were created in a moment of great hazard. Let those who criticize the course taken remember the emergency which saw its beginning. The man most responsible for it is the President of the United States, who, on the 4th of March 1933, assumed the governmental burdens of our people. Sixteen millions were unemployed. Banks were closed. Industry was paralyzed. Human hope was at the lowest ebb in all our history.

Confidence was inspired immediately by the mere fact of action. The President was not afraid to try. He knew mistakes would ensue. No one has been franker to admit them. He has not only admitted them but has taken quick steps to correct them. No responsibility since Lincoln has been comparable to that of Roosevelt, nor has any president since Lincoln selected such a nonpartisan cabinet. It was Lincoln's task to save the Union. It was Roosevelt's task to save organized society. He recognized that it could not be done except by strong governmental action restoring social and economic order.

It was no time for theories. The President could not fail to remember—nor must we fail to recall—the words of Lincoln: "I cannot control events. Events control me." No one can make a fair analysis of the present state of things without admitting that as Lincoln was forced into measures and devices by events, so has Roosevelt been. We were not in the midst of an ordinary financial panic. Panic had seized our whole people, and men and women who knew nothing about finance were troubled about the question of life itself.

When a camper is struck by a storm, he quickly drives pegs to tie down his tent. When the waters of the mad Mississippi swept over the lands, the farmers did not wait to call an engineer. They resorted to spade and shovel and other immediate devices both to stay and direct the flood of waters. Roosevelt has simply sought to meet emergencies by driving down stakes to which could be anchored the concerted energies of our people. He has sought to hold the flood waters by whatever means came to hand.

You may hear criticism of measures or of laws, but can you name a single one that has not been directed at an abuse which we all admit must be removed? Obviously, therefore, differences of opinion concern details rather than the basic principle of recovery.

Our disordered state was not the result of momentary indiscretions. It was the accumulation of the ills that had piled up in more than a decade. We refused to see or think. We entered into a period that could not escape the reactions of the most stupendous upheaval the whole world had ever experienced. Frontiers had been changed, governments had fallen, the normal currents of trade had been reversed or destroyed, and millions who could not find labor found death. Yet in this country the man who gave warning of the certain consequences of our smug complacency was an alarmist. He who urged change was denounced as a radical. Certain forms of organized wealth and human greed seized upon governmental preferences to further selfish aims. There could be but one end to that.

Well do I remember a political meeting in New York City at the close of the campaign of 1920. At that time I said, at the very seat of organized wealth, that if the enterprises in mind, when big business was financing a political campaign, were carried through, then in a comparatively brief season the well-meaning business men in America would thank God for the party of Jefferson, because it would be necessary to the salvation of the country. One extreme follows another. The result of extreme reactionism would carry us to the extreme of revolution unless some instrument to prevent could be found.

That instrument, happily, in the hour of crisis was at hand. The party of Jefferson has always been the liberal party; and upon the ground which he plotted then and we seek to maintain now, the balance is being regained. The philosophy of Jefferson in its essence was that government must respond to social needs, and it cannot do it unless it changes as our social conditions, under the relentless processes of evolution, change. Failure to do that very thing led to the evil times that fell upon us. Our economic and governmental organisms could no longer stand the infection of unhealthy practices and neglect. Then came the collapse. At that critical hour the President of the United States became the attending physician of a dangerously sick land.

When we call attention to the now-improved conditions, the critic insists that they will not last. There are those who honestly differ with the President in many of his policies. But can anyone deny that the passion of his soul is to save the country as Lincoln's was to save the Union? Is it not true that the propagandist critic is a man who wants a return of the old order which brought its preferences to him? We hear it said that business has been taken over by the Government. Is it not true that business, crying for help, threw itself into the hands of government? Did not the banks and the railroads come forward to be saved? Has supplication come from the Government to enter business, or has business as a whole turned to Washington for relief?

Business is but a process and result of human labor. In the modern order of things a man, to live, must work, and the products of his toil are the making of business. The President's one purpose is to restore social order, and social order is dependent upon an orderly industry. If society is prostrate, then what instrument more logically and naturally can be invoked than Government itself? It is the instrument of society, the thing created to act for the whole.

We hear it said that the cost of our recovery is too great, that the accumulating debt will wreck us. We had a large debt to start with, and it could only be paid by restoring prosperity. I remember as a farm boy that the old sucker pump in the well would not work until you poured water into it. And so the case has been with us. It was necessary to take of our reserves and pour the waters of our resources into the pump in order that things might be set going again.

I do not speak for the President, but I am certain in my own conviction that when business, which was sick—and sick unto death—is ready to leave the hospital and keep itself in health, it will find a wide open door. I recur to that figure of speech in which I stated that the President in his every measure was simply driving down stakes for a mooring. They are but the beginning. Legislative and Executive measures born in critical times of emergency will be refined and changed as social needs suggest. That is the theory of a liberal government. But they would never have been driven by the hand of reaction, because the selfish, designing reactionary has always profited by the salvaging of wreckage. Nor would they be refined and perfected by the hand of reaction.

One of the most reassuring things in our whole situation, as I, at least, see it, is that in the 14 months of our rebuilding, with public emotions aroused, with nerves tense and throbbing with the expressed fear that our beloved country was drifting into chaos, the captain of the ship of state has been calm. He has refused no one who sought to counsel with him. He has consulted every class and every condition of life. His continuing strength for his labors is nothing short of a miracle. He believes in the common sense of our people and the perpetuity of our Government, provided that Government is responsive to public needs; and in that faith he goes forward. Bear in mind that human despair brings the elements of turbulence into our public opinion, and they descend upon Congress. If we but knew what the President has withstood, he would by common consent be regarded as the great conservator of our sanity and stability.

LIGHTSHIP "NANTUCKET" DISASTER

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the Nantucket lightship tragedy, and to include therein two short editorials, not controversial, paying tribute to those men who lost their lives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, Tuesday evening the Nation was shocked by the news, given out by radio and the press, that the lightship Nantucket had been rammed and sunk by the White Star Liner Olympic.

This is the first time that so serious a disaster has occurred in our Lighthouse Service, and all our people will be deeply interested in learning the real cause underlying this new tragedy of the sea, which naturally tends to lessen the public confidence in our modern mechanical navigation. That an aid to navigation placed in a point of danger to protect ocean traffic and guide it safely to the haven should itself have been destroyed by collision seems as strange as it is regrettable.

For many years the lightship Nantucket had rendered faithful and efficient service, and it was known to all mariners sailing our North Atlantic waters. It was the largest craft of its kind in the world and equipped with the most modern appliances—an incandescent light of 3,000 candlepower, a powerful radiobeacon, and synchronized submarine oscillator. Its radiobeacon could reach out to ships from 300 to 500 miles distant and under ordinary conditions its masthead light was clearly visible for 12 miles.

The ship, securely anchored by heavy chains, and hence unable to guard itself against collision, was stationed some 42 miles from the island of Nantucket, and it now lies at its post, but 180 feet beneath the water. For years it had furnished the first point of contact with America for trans-Atlantic vessels bound for the port of New York, and navigators innumerable have breathed a sigh of relief upon sighting this friendly ship, which was their assurance that their course had been true and that, thanks to her, they could now escape the hidden reefs and shoals of those dangerous waters.

Of recent years the reassuring contact has been made through the medium of the radiobeacon long before the ship was actually sighted, and regardless of storm, darkness, or fog. Yet this great boon to navigators, operating through the dense fog, brought about the destruction of the lightship and caused the death of all but 4 of her crew of 11 officers and men. Five of the dead were from my city of New Bedford.

I wish to pay tribute to those who died at their post of duty, and to extend sympathy to their bereaved families. Under the best of conditions theirs was a most unenviable occupation. Their station was a lonely spot on the ocean, far from sight of land. The sea there was almost never still, and they were constantly tossed by waves which often became mountainous; but the light and the radiobeacon must not fail.

I am sure that I am expressing the wish of the Congress that the fullest possible investigation of this tragedy be carried out, not only to establish the blame, if fault there was, but that means may be found to prevent the recurrence of this disaster in the future; and also that the families of the men who died may be adequately cared for by a sympathetic and grateful Government.

A statement and editorial follow:

[From the New Bedford Mercury]

LIFE ON LIGHTSHIP IS ONE OF CONSTANT VIGIL AND LONELINESS

NANTUCKET, May 15.—Men that know loneliness man the rugged little ships that hold vigil on reef and shoal along the Atlantic coast.

For 2 months at a stretch the pitching lightship is their home. For 2 months at a stretch they oil and condition the huge oscillators that moan through the fog-blurred bay; that drawl their lullaby at night. They shine the big brass bell and test the beacon; and then go back to their toughest task, whiling away the hours.

Some play cards, many read, and nearly all listen to the radio. But the tender that comes once a month to bring ashore those who have completed their tour, usually carries back a load of hooked rugs, woodwork, and basketry. The men are allowed a month shore leave.

But 2 months is a long time to spend on a cramped ship, stalled in the ocean lanes, with only passing vessels for company. In his small quarters under the clanging bell and the shining beacon, the lightship man in his bunk occasionally hears the swish of a big hull and the pounding of heavy engines. He rolls over and peers through a porthole as a trans-Atlantic liner, ablaze with light, slides by in the darkness. Then the lightship writhes and twists in the grip of the wash and the lightship man rolls over to dream.

The lightship which went down today when the Olympic rammed her in a fog was the last word in this type of craft. And lightship men said she lost whom they regard the two most important members of her crew—the two cooks. One died after being picked up, and the other, it was feared, went down to the treacherous shoals, still in the galley.

[From the New Bedford Times]

THE LIGHTSHIP DISASTER

The disaster which overtook the Nantucket lightship, rammed and sunk by the Olympic yesterday morning, strikes home to New Bedford. Six of the 11 men on board belonged here; and of the 7 who lost their lives, 5 were credited to this city.

The accident emphasizes the hazards of the lightship service. Only a short while ago the Nantucket was grazed by a passing vessel, but on that occasion luck was with her, the damage was slight, and nobody was injured. In the thick fog of yesterday fate was less kind. The radiobeacon and other mechanical devices for insuring safety did not avail to prevent the collision which quickly sent her to the bottom.

An investigation will show whether the tragedy resulted from faulty navigation of the ocean liner or whether it must be classed as an unavoidable accident. Meanwhile, it is in order to give thought to the danger to which the lightshipmen are exposed on their lonely stations. Vessels are supposed to pass as closely as possible—and sometimes they come too close, and the result is death. Those who lost their lives yesterday must rank as heroes and are worthy of honor. They died at the hands of those they were safeguarding from the perils of the sea. For them no retreat to some safe haven when storms rage or fog intensifies their danger. Under such conditions it is all the more imperative that they remain on their station, sending out their calls to guide vessels safely clear of the treacherous shoals—aware of the risk they run but meeting it unflinchingly.

For those who were saved, and especially the mate, C. E. Mosher, of New Bedford, we can all give thanks. To those who died we should extend honors due to all who died bravely in the performance of duty.

WELFARE OF THE LABORING CLASS

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, some remedy must quickly be found for the misery and wretchedness which presses so heavily on the large majority of the laboring class. Workingmen have been given over, isolated and defenseless, to the callousness of employers and the greed of unrestained competition. A small number of rich men have been able to lay upon the masses of the poor a yoke little better than slavery itself.

If business men ever adverted to the possibility that industrial relations might have an ethical aspect, they promptly satisfied their conscience by recalling the teaching of the classical economists to the effect that every free contract is also a fair contract.

Speaking generally, I may say that the rights and the obligations of both capital and labor and proposed remedies for the most destructive evils in the industrial system, showing partiality neither to employer nor to employee, treating both with evenhanded justice and charity, resolves itself into four general divisions, property, state, wages, and labor unions, which four subjects constitute the most fundamental and difficult of all our industrial problems.

Property should be widely distributed and as many as possible of the laboring class should become owners. The advantages of society would be greatly increased by a more equitable division of the productive wealth of our country, and, as far as possible, bridge over the gulf between vast wealth and sheer poverty. I do not believe in the doctrines of plutocracy, which teach that the function of ownership belongs to a few industrial and banking supermen, while the great mass of people are competent only to use the property under the dominating direction of the so-called "supermen." No reconstruction will be satisfactory or stable which does not include a wide distribution of the ownership and the profits of ownership and advantages of modern scientific improvements among the laboring masses.

State: Whenever the general welfare and interest of the great majority suffers and is threatened with destruction, it is the duty of the State and public authority to intervene, as has this administration under the great leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt. This intervention should be broad and progressive. Our situation justified the enactment into law the 30-hour week and all reasonable measures of labor legislation. The abolishment of child labor, minimum-wage laws, and insurance against sickness, old age, and unemployment must necessarily follow. "No class legislation" is one of the shallowest of all shallow slogans that have protected the strong at the expense of the weak and defeated the ends of social justice. Legislation should be adjusted to meet the varying needs of the different social classes. The rich have always had means of shielding themselves and stand less in need of help from the State, but are usually the first to apply; while the poor have no resources of their own to fall back on and must rely chiefly upon the State to recognize their need. The wage earners belong principally to this class, and it necessarily follows, must be protected and cared for by the Government. This principle has been followed, in my judgment, to a great extent in this new deal, and the 30-hour week should also be passed to round out the program.

Wages: It has been generally thought by many that the wage contract fell under the regulative principle of supply and demand. Outside of the working classes themselves it was almost universally held that the wages fixed in the market by the forces of unlimited competition were always fair and just. No matter how low the remuneration of labor descended, it was ethically right and correct if it was determined by a free contract. This is not so, and has been proven incorrect and the dictates of nature have decried that in any bargain between man and man the remuneration must be sufficient to support the wage earner in reasonable and frugal comfort. If, through necessity or fear of worse evil, the workingman accepts harder conditions because the employer will give him no better, he is made the victim of force and injustice.

Almost everyone renders at least lip service to the principle of the living wage. It is the principle embodied in the N.R.A. No business whose existence depends on paying less than living wages to its workers has any right to continue in this country, and by that is meant wages that insure a decent living.

If that principle had been heeded during the past 12 years this great depression would have been much less severe, and there is a possibility that it would not have happened at all. Persons whose judgment has not been perverted by antiquated economic theories or selfish economic interest realize that the main cause of the depression has been too little money in the hands of those who would have bought more of the products of industry and the farm, and too much money in the hands of those who were unable to spend more than a small part of it for consumption goods. Had employers given more to labor and kept less for themselves, they would not have carried so far the overexpansion of our industrial plant, and therefore caused so much unemployment. If all the workers in this country had been receiving living wages during the last 20 years, they would have been able to purchase much, if not all, the goods that would have been produced.

A living wage and shorter hours, thereby putting these idle men back to work, is peculiarly appropriate and necessary in our present situation, and our present situation will never be solved successfully until we do this. Until labor obtains higher wages and shorter hours and permanent employment, thereby obtaining a larger amount of purchasing power and a greater share of profit, we shall not make much progress in wading out of our present appalling situation of 10,000,000 unemployed. We will not be able to prevent the coming of another and even more destructive collapse unless we give labor more and capital less. Our recent experience has proved by demonstration that a living wage is not only right ethically but wise economically.

Labor unions: Another subject we must also consider is the organization of labor and their right to bargain. It is a general and lasting law that workingmen's associations should be so organized and governed as to furnish the best and most suitable means for attaining what is aimed at; that is to say, for helping each individual member to better his or her condition to the utmost in body, mind, and property. It is well to distinguish between effective unions and hypocritical imitations. Into the United States has come such imitation, known as the "company union", and the words just quoted are an implicit condemnation of that abominable invention. The company union does not enable its members to "better their condition to the utmost in body, mind, and property." The right of the worker to enter associations is and should be his natural right. The company union violates this right and principle because in practically every case it is imposed from above by threats and coercion. The worker's right to form labor unions and to bargain collectively is as much his right as his right to participate through delegated representatives in the making of laws which regulate his civic conduct. Both are inherent rights. The worker can exercise his God-given faculty of freedom only through a system which permits him to choose freely his representatives in industry. From a practical standpoint the worker's free choice of representatives must be safeguarded in order to secure for him equality of contractive power in wage contracts. Undue interference with this choice is an unfair labor practice, unjust alike to the worker and the general public.

This, I believe, in a general way and brief time explains my stand relative to labor.

I have wandered somewhat from the subject of the 30-hour week bill, which I had the honor and privilege of signing a petition to take the bill from further consideration of the committee, and when 145 names have been attached to the petition it will bring the bill before the House to have the Members, by roll call, show their true status. Certainly no man should hesitate to cast his vote upon his own full convictions without the fear of what anyone thinks. It is utterly ridiculous to think of Members of the House being in the frame of mind that they will hesitate to vote on questions of national importance such as this bill is. I have signed the petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the Crosser bill, giving to the railroad men the 6-hour day and I most certainly hope we will not adjourn until we have had an expression upon both these measures.

In final conclusion no permanent progress can be made until these 10,000,000 men are put back to work, and that cannot be done except by shortening the hours of labor and at the same time paying decent living wages for those shorter hours of work. By this procedure employment would be spread so that again we will give to those people what this country guarantees to people who are willing and anxious to work—a right to make a living for their families and themselves.

FEDERAL INSPECTION OF GRAIN—A COSTLY LUXURY FOR THE FARMERS

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a statement made by a former Member of this House, Mr. Knute Wefald.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by a former Member of the House, Hon. Knud Wefald, Railroad and Warehouse Commissioner of Minnesota:

While Congress is fussing with the farm question and has a hard time in deciding what to do relative to new legislation, there are laws upon the statute books of long standing that ought to be fearlessly and honestly administered in favor of the farmers, but which under the new deal work more harm to the farmers' interest than under the old deal.

It means more to the farmer to get every cent of what his products are worth than it does to be paid for wanton destruction of his products.

The United States Grain Standards Act, under which the farmer markets his grain, is being misinterpreted. Therefore I believe it timely that the attention of Congress be called to this matter, especially regarding the marketing of barley in the Northwest.

The United States Grain Standards Act was passed by Congress as an added protection for the farmers in the marketing of their grain. It conferred upon the Department of Agriculture the power to promulgate uniform grain grades and authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to act on appeals to him when disputes arise as to the correct grading of grain.

This law never intended that Federal inspection of grain should altogether supersede and displace inspection of grain in States. It was intended as an added protection for the farmers' interest.

The State of Minnesota has, and has had for many years, good and sufficient laws relative to grading, inspection, and marketing of grain, under which the farmers' interests are protected. Minnesota has the most highly trained and the most efficient grain inspection department to be found anywhere in the United States.

The personnel of this department has been carefully selected over a long period of years; it has been and is now free from political influence; the Minneapolis office of this department can be rated as the foremost grain inspection unit in the United States, both in regard to personnel as well as mechanical equipment.

I am familiar with its workings, as it is a department of the Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission, where I serve as one of the commissioners.

Under the laws of the State of Minnesota, two State boards of grain appeals of three members each for each of the terminal markets of Minneapolis and Duluth was set up, long before the United States Grain Standard Act was passed. The members of this board are appointed by the Governor, who selects them for their experience in grain matters. To these appeal boards are referred all disputes between buyers and sellers over grades placed on grain by the State inspection department.

The Federal Department of Agriculture maintains an inspection set-up at both Minneapolis and Duluth, which is supervised by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics at Washington, D.C. It was intended by the sponsors of the United States Grain Act that the Federal inspection set-up should function as a last resort. If the buyer was dissatisfied with the grade given, he would appeal to the State board of grain appeals, and if still dissatisfied he would appeal to the Federal inspection department, whose decision would be final.

Instead of exercising its function, as intended by the law, the Federal inspection set-up, especially at Minneapolis, has a large and unwarranted force of men at work as inspectors who, often without occasion, invade the quarters of the State inspection departments, undertaking to instruct State grain inspectors, who know much more about the business of grading grain than do most Federal grain inspectors; threatening State inspectors who honestly cannot conform to their way of thinking, with revocation of their Federal license, which all State inspectors and members of the appeal board must have in order to qualify under the Federal law.

The last year and a half has been a very trying time for the Minnesota State grain inspectors and the members of the State grain appeal board due to continual controversy with the Federal inspection set-up. The main controversy has been the interpretation of the Federal grades on barley and the injustice of the barley grades themselves.

With the advent of legal beer, barley became a valuable grain. Instead, as grades on barley have been promulgated and interpreted the last 2 years, it has played into the hands of the processors of barley, the maltsters.

A grade of "scabby" barley was promulgated under which practically all discoloration in barley was classed as "scab." This definition was put on barley as a penalty against it, for malting purposes. The minute the designation "scab" was put on a car of barley it reduced the price of such barley from 2 to 10 cents per bushel. Yet most of this barley was eventually bought by the maltsters at the reduced price and used for the making of malt.

The Minnesota Grain Appeal Board, being men of long experience with barley, knew that very little of the barley marketed in Minneapolis (only a very little barley is marketed in Duluth) was affected by "scab" fungus, had extensive examinations made of many of the worst samples submitted to them at the Minnesota University Farm School by outstanding chemists of national reputation, who upheld the appeal board in its contention. Numerous feeding tests, wherein some of the supposedly most "scabby" barley was fed to hogs at the university farm school, were also made, and the "scabby" barley, so-called, proved itself to be of as good feed quality as barley that did not come under the ban of "scab" grade.

The State inspectors, being intimidated by Federal inspectors, had to tighten up on "scab" designation; the number of appeals to the State grain appeal board increased, and these men courageously protected the interests of the farmers, all the while protesting to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics against the unjust "scab" designation.

In the summer of 1933, for the 1932–33 crop year, the designation "scab" was changed to "blight", but to this was added "or mold", the result of which was the handicap for ordinary barley was increased.

The courageous stand of the State appeal board saved thousands and thousands of dollars for barley producers; in each carload from which the "scab" designation was taken it meant a saving of from $20 to over $100 a carload, according to the size of the car and the penalty intended, while the interest of the maltsters seems to have been uppermost in the minds of the Federal people. During the crop year 1932–33 the Federal people changed the method of inspecting barley four times.

Let it be said for the bulk of the buyers for the maltsters that even they consider the grades on barley and the inspection as unjust; but if they can buy barley at a discount, and especially when Federal grading rules practically say that they shall buy it at a discount, there is not much justification for them to do otherwise.

Some of the oldest and most experienced buyers of malting barley have told me that such barley as has been marketed in Minnesota during the last 2 years is exceptionally good malting barley. In no branch of either State or Federal Government have I ever met such an overbearing, bureaucratic haughtiness as that evidenced by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics in the controversy over grades on barley and inspection between it and the Minnesota inspection set-up.

In its pedantry, it has embarked upon a rule-or-ruin policy and a policy of expansion of its own power, wholly inconsistent with the public good. The United States Grain Standards Act was not passed with any thought of its being used as a club over the farmer's head in order to make him produce better grains of various kinds. Yet, in this case with barley, a penalty is placed on such grain as is not absolutely perfect for the purpose of making the farmers raise "perfect" barley, the Department working hand in hand also with various associations who do not represent the farmers.

When the Minnesota State Grain Appeal Board insisted upon interpreting the grading laws, both State and Federal, in conformity with their conscience, as it was their sworn duty to do, the Secretary of Agriculture, at the request of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, revoked the license to inspect barley for the Minneapolis members of the appeal board, in spite of the fact that the grain trade stood solidly behind the appeal board. And the grain trade must understand grain.

The appeal board members demanded a hearing, which was finally given them; but as I was personally present, I can testify that the hearing was a star-chamber proceeding, presided over by an employee of the Bureau, who was biased against the appeal board members in the extreme. Only as a courtesy to the Governor of Minnesota, who appeared at one session of the hearing, was the main testimony of the defendants admitted; but all of this testimony seems to have been disregarded in the findings.

With the many great and pressing problems weighing down on the Secretary of Agriculture, it is reasonable to expect that a seemingly small matter, like the one I have here called to your attention, cannot come to his personal attention, so he can familiarize himself with it; yet it is no small matter for the farmer, especially with its ramifications into the future; nor is it of small importance with respect to State rights versus Federal prerogative. There should be a limit to the extension of Federal bureaucracy.

The members of the State appeal board have as yet not had their barley inspector's licenses restored to them, but they should not have to be under a cloud for having performed their sworn duty, nor should the efficient operation of the State of Minnesota's grain inspection be hampered.

However, there is an innate sense of justice in the American people, sometimes even in the marts of trade. Such is the confidence of the grain trade, from the country elevator men to the dealers in the terminal markets, in Minnesota inspection of grain, that since the State appeal board members were punished by the Department of Agriculture, the trade is losing faith in Federal inspection.

I herewith present a statement by the Minnesota State Board of Grain Appeals relative to the controversy I have described, which is a very sober and enlightening statement:

BUREAUCRACY AT ITS WORST

"The Bureau of Agricultural Economics caused Hon. Henry E. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, to wire the members of the state board of grain appeals, consisting of Otto A. Zimmerman, M. E. Jerdee, and C. M. Gislason, October 5, 1933, that their licenses to inspect barley had been temporarily suspended, they supposedly having misgraded 16 cars of barley between September 5 and October 4.

"The board requested an oral hearing, which was granted, and was held at 404 Flour Exchange, Minneapolis, Minn.

"There, of course, was no truth in the charges, as the board has always conscientiously performed its duties and applied the standards as promulgated by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. But, as was expected by everyone familiar with the conditions, the board was found guilty and the license permanently suspended.

"The real fact of the matter is that the Bureau of Agricultural Economics was very much at sea itself regarding the inspection of barley as shown by testimony; that the method of inspecting barley was changed four different times in the crop year of 1932 to 1933. The methods orally prescribed were haphazard and led to heavy losses to producers and shippers of barley, showing losses from 2 cents to 10 cents a bushel. The reason for those many changes were undoubtedly due to the evidence the state board of grain appeals, Minneapolis, gathered through plating tests made at the Agricultural School of the University of Minnesota, which showed that barley which was picked as 100-percent scab by the inspectors under the supervision of the Federal Inspection Department, showed only from 3 percent to 43 percent of scab, most of the samples ranging from 5 percent to 20 percent. In order to cover up their inability to pick scab the last change made in April, when the name 'scab' was changed to 'blight', they added to the 'blight' 'and/or mold.' By that act they admitted that they had been in error in their former interpretations.

"The Federal Inspection Department was not consistent in its grading, as its records will show that their inspectors and the Board of Review at Chicago differed as much as 4 percent and 5 percent, and possibly more, on the same sample inspected.

"It was also shown by evidence that the Federal inspectors at Minneapolis varied as much as 2 percent on the same sample, picking two different portions of the same sample. All this would indicate that the Federal inspectors were not competent to accuse the Minneapolis State Board of Grain Appeals of not having properly picked this barley when they themselves have been incapable of doing it, and considering that the State board of grain appeals worked an entirely different sample than the Federal inspectors and Board of Supervisors.

"The portion of the sample picked at that time contained only the amount of blighted barley as indicated by their certification. The Federal contact man between the Federal inspection and the Minnesota State inspection and the board of appeals, found some of the samples that he picked with members of the board to contain just the same amount as the board had picked; while other samples showed a small fraction of 1 percent difference, which can be easily accounted for by being another part of the sample, and as the Federal inspector's testimony showed might vary as much as 2 percent. And the fact, too, that the Federal inspectors and the board of review, Chicago, vary as much as 5 percent on the same sample, it would seem that they are in rather a poor position to assume the attitude that they have.

"The Federal supervisor and contact man between the Federal and the Minnesota State Inspection Departments, testified at the hearing to the effect that the State board of grain appeals at Minneapolis had made very few changes in the month of August and that he only noticed that the board was getting more lenient in the latter part of September. The records show an entirely different situation. In August the State board of grain appeals removed the blight notation on 66.66 percent of the barley that was submitted to them for judgment, and in the month of September it showed that the board had tightened up very materially and removed the blight notation on only 48 percent of the cars submitted to them for judgment. The records also disclose that the State board of grain appeals removed the blight notation as follows:

	Percent
October 1932	42.85
November 1932	50.00
December 1932	84.00
January 1933	96.67
February 1933	39.13
March 1933	95.00
April 1933	78.72

"The Federal Inspection Department did not take action during those months, which, in the face of what happened in October, proved positively that they were not sure of the ground on which they were operating. The producers and shippers of the Northwest were saved these enormous losses by the action of the board of State grain appeals at Minneapolis, which protected the producers and shippers in this market. The board's action was approved by the fact that buyers and sellers accepted the findings of the board. Producers and shippers that were compelled to use other markets that did not have an active, competent board to protect them were compelled to assume the losses of from 2 cents to 10 cents a bushel, and there is plenty of competent evidence to prove this contention. The Minneapolis market received during November 1933, December 1933, January, February, and up to March 26, 1934, 4,171 cars of barley. The elevators at Minneapolis during that same period loaded out 2,910 cars—total, 7,081 cars—and only 17 cars out of this total were appealed for Federal inspection, the trade evidently having lost confidence in the Federal inspection, as their experience in the past has been that the Federal inspection is constantly degrading, and so are selling mostly cars that they feel are undergraded by sample. The inspectors, working under duress, as they are (as was testified to at the hearing), makes it impossible to compute the losses that the producers and country shipper are suffering.

* * * * * * *

"On August 11, 1916, the Congress of the United States passed the United States Grain Standards Act. Section 6 reads as follows:

"'That whenever standards shall have been fixed and established under this act for any grain and any quantity of such grain sold, offered for sale, or consigned for sale, or which has been shipped, or delivered for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce, shall have been inspected and a dispute arises as to whether the grade as determined by such inspection of any such grain in fact conforms to the standard of the specified grade, any interested party may, either with or without reinspection, appeal the question to the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause such investigation to be made and such tests to be applied as he may deem necessary and to determine the true grade.'

"Congress undoubtedly never intended that the Federal Inspection Department should interfere with the grades as established on grain when there was no dispute between buyer or seller about the grain in question, taking for granted that both buyers and sellers are competent to know that the proper grade has been placed on same.

"Only 2 of the 16 cars in question were appealed to the Federal. On the other 14 cars buyers and sellers testified that the grade placed on the cars by the Minnesota State Board of Appeals was satisfactory, and they further proved it by the prices they paid for these cars. Some of them, notwithstanding they only graded No. 3 barley, sold within 1 cent to 3 cents of the very top of the market for malting barley of the cars that were of malting variety. Of the cars that were of the Trebi variety, only considered feed, brought way over the top for the closing price of feed barley on the day the cars were sold. All of the men, both buyers and sellers, are men of long years of experience and certainly know what they are doing."

NORTHWEST FARMERS HAVE BEEN PENALIZED MILLIONS OF DOLLARS BY DEPARTMENTAL IGNORANCE

"The name, 'Bureau of Agricultural Economics', is suggestive to the public mind not familiar with the true facts that this Bureau is a division of the United States Department of Agriculture, whose object is to aid the farmers of the country in their economic problems. This Department, however, as it has been administered by the men who have been in charge for the past 10 to 14 years, has been anything but a help to the producers of grain in their economic problems.

"Those men who are familiar with the true situation have expressed themselves as being convinced that the Bureau of Agricultural Economics has cost the producers of grain in the Northwest many millions of dollars through uncertain experimentation in the promulgation of Federal grades on grain.

"In 1928 buyers of American-grown barley in Germany reported that an epidemic had occurred among the hogs of that country, and that it had been determined that the said epidemic was the result of feeding American-grown barley which was infected with some disease. The United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics immediately attributed this epidemic to so-called 'scabby' barley and ordered the licensed inspectors to grade all barley containing one or two pinkish-colored kernels to approximately a 10-pound sample, to be graded 'sample grade barley, scabby.'

"This procedure was strenuously objected to by the Minnesota State Board of Grain Appeals at Minneapolis but was, nevertheless, carried out for several months, at the end of which time the Bureau decided that none of the barley from the Northwestern States was infected badly enough to be injurious for feeding purposes. The Department accordingly modified their instructions to the inspectors at Minneapolis and Duluth, and northwestern barley again sold at a premium over barley grown in other sections of the country. The result of this hysteria on the part of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, before they were forced to admit their error in judgment, was the loss of thousands of dollars to northwestern producers of barley.

"This scabby-barley scare was again revived in 1932, when the claim was made by the Bureau that barley infected with scab was injurious to livestock, and especially to hogs. Another verbal order was given to all licensed inspectors to grade all barley containing 6 to 8 pinkish-colored kernels to the handful 'sample grade.' After another stormy protest from the Minnesota State Board of Grain Appeals at Minneapolis as to this unjust method of grading, the Bureau again changed the procedure and issued verbal instructions which required the inspectors to weigh 100 grams of each sample and sift it over a large chess sieve. If 12 to 15 kernels of grayish or pinkish kernels fell through the sieve, the inspector was required to grade the car 'sample grade' and the barley was considered as of distinctly low quality.

"This resulted in a great many cars of good barley, and in some cases of choice malting barley, being graded 'sample grade', and a consequent reduction in price of from 2 to 10 cents per bushel to the northwest producers.

"Subsequent to this decidedly unfair ruling, Mr. Knud Wefald, member of the Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission, and Otto Zimmerman, chairman of the Minnesota State Board of Grain Appeals, went to Washington to lay a protest before the Secretary of Agriculture and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. They were supported in this protest by shippers' organizations and elevator associations of the Northwest, but no changes were made in the method of grading until a recent new order which establishes grades for the crop year of 1934–35. Under these new grading rules, the bureau has again changed the method for barley grading, the rules providing that the blighted notation shall not be used unless there is more than 4 percent of so-called 'blight' and/or mold. Thus they have now more than doubled the percentage which was previously being used.

"When the Bureau of Agricultural Economics took over the inspection of grain in 1916, the Minnesota State Grain Inspection Department was one of the oldest departments of its kind in the United States, having been established in 1885. Minnesota grades were recognized and accepted in the world markets, and most of the inspection departments in the United States had adopted them.

"The Minnesota grades on Northern Spring wheat provided for numerical grades from No. 1 Northern Spring to No. 4 Northern Spring. These grades also provided that 'all spring, durum, and western wheat containing 15 percent or more of moisture, or in a heating condition, or otherwise unfit for store, shall be classed "no grade" with inspector's notation as to what grade same would be if in condition. For example: No grade No. 1, no grade No. 2, no grade No. 3, etc., with a notation of the moisture content.' Thus wheat containing less than 15 percent of moisture was graded No. 1 if other factors permitted. And unless the percentage of moisture was 15 percent or more, no wheat was penalized by a no-grade notation.

"When the Federal grades became operative in 1917 they required that each numerical grade from 1 to 5 should have a maximum moisture content. This content on No. 1 wheat was established at 13½ percent, on No. 2 at 14½ percent, on No. 3 at 14½ percent, on No. 4 at 15½ percent, and on No. 5 at 15½ percent. All wheat containing more than 15½ percent moisture was graded 'sample grade.' These moisture limitations were established over the objections of the Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission and the Minnesota State Board of Grain Appeals, who contended that the moisture-testing apparatus was not sufficently accurate to draw the line so finely in moisture content between the various numerical grades.

"The Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission and the Minnesota State Board of Grain Appeals maintained also that wheat could be safely stored, especially in the Northwestern States, with a moisture content of 15 percent. They were, however, willing to compromise on a 14½-percent basis, but the Federal grades went into operation, and wheat containing 15 percent moisture was thereafter graded No. 4, whereas it had previously been placed in grade No. 1 if other factors permitted.

"Under the new grades now established by the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics, and which became effective on July 2, 1933, the Bureau has now, after 17 years of operation, changed its grades on wheat insofar as moisture content is concerned, so that they nearly conform to the grades which were used by the Minnesota State Inspection Department prior to the time when the Federal grades became effective.

"The Bureau now justifies this change in Miscellaneous Publication No. 173 of the United States Department of Agriculture of September 1933, on page 56, under the heading of 'Moisture Content' in the following words:

"'The facts developed from a careful study of the use and application of the grade factor "moisture content" in the official grain standard, justify a recommendation to eliminate moisture content as a factor for the determination of numerical grade in the standards for wheat, rye, oats, feed oats, mixed feed oats, and barley.'

"And by the further statement on page 57 of the same publication, under the heading of 'Moisture Specifications in Relation to Inspection Efficiency':

"'Four principal reasons have motivated the Bureau in making these recommendations pertaining to the grade factor of moisture content. The first and probably the most important of these reasons is that of inspection efficiency and intermarket uniformity in the application of the standards.

"'Inspection experience has shown that considerable variation in the grades assigned to wheat by different markets or inspectors is caused by the one-half-percent moisture-content intervals between grades 1 and 2, and between grades 2 and 3, of the present official wheat standards. These moisture-content intervals between the important contract grades of wheat are too narrow for practical application by inspectors. In the operation of the Brown-Duvel moisture-testing apparatus a constant possible error factor of about 0.3 percent is present even with standardized equipment and careful management, whereas with apparatus that may be slightly nonstandard, or apparatus operated with variable gas quality or pressure or with careless management, the error factor may be, and sometimes is, as great as 0.5 or 0.6 percent. It is questionable, also, whether the more modern electric moisture-testing equipment can be relied on to eliminate the possible error factor in making moisture determinations below that of 0.3 percent. For these very practical reasons, the one-half-percent moisture-content intervals between some of the wheat grades are at times a source of considerable nonuniformity in the application of the wheat standards.'

"In other words, the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics have now, after 17 years, come to realize that the contention of the Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission and the Minnesota State Board of Grain Appeals were correct. They are, however, probably overlooking the fact that for 17 years the producers in the Northwest have been penalized millions of dollars in the reduced prices which they have received for their grain, in addition to the enromous expense which they have had to bear as taxpayers to pay the expenses of operating the Bureau of Agricultural Economics in its 17 years of experimentation.

"Thus, if it takes this Bureau the same length of time to discover that they are entirely wrong in their condemnation of perfectly good barley as being scabby or blighted, the producers will continue to suffer and pay the expenses for another 17 years."

THE AMERICAN LEGION IN POLITICS AND REPUBLICANS COMING INTO DEMOCRATIC PRIMARIES

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am taking this opportunity to let my Democratic colleagues in the House know what took place in the primaries recently held in the Fifth District of Alabama. I am doing this so you may be on the look-out and prevent such unfair tactics being used against you as were adopted by the American Legion and the Republicans against me.

The American Legion claims it is not in politics, but I want to tell you that the American Legion is in politics and that in my case its agents stooped to very unfair and unscrupulous methods which helped to defeat me. In Alabama ex-service men are exempt from payment of poll tax; this gives them an undue advantage over the younger voters.

On February 20, 1934, the Alabama Legionnaire, the official publication of and owned exclusively by the American Legion, whose editor is D. Trotter Jones, of Montgomery, Ala., published what was supposed to be the vote of Alabama Congressmen on veterans' legislation during the Seventy-second and Seventy-third Congresses. Our votes on 11 questions were recorded; however, the main 2 were the Rankin widows and orphans bill and the President's economy bill. The Alabama Legionnaire records my vote on the Rankin widows and orphans bill as "No." The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 2, 1932, page 9695, shows that I voted for this measure. On April 11, 1934, one of my opponents, Maj. Joe Starnes, of Guntersville, Ala., a legionnaire, reproduced the record of our vote on veterans' legislation, undermarked, "Paid political advertisement." It was sent to the legionnaires through the entire district, by F. A. Miller, of Gadsden, Ala., formerly commander of the American Legion post at Gadsden. Mr. Miller stated in a letter he sent with the record of our votes that I had the worst voting record against the ex-service man of any Alabama Congressman and that with my voting record he did not see how any ex-service man in the district could support me. On May 26, 1934, I wired D. Trotter Jones, editor of the Alabama Legionnaire, to advise me who furnished him with the information that I voted against the Rankin widows and orphans bill. I received a wire from him that Col. John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman national legislative committee of the American Legion, Washington, had furnished him with this information.

On May 31, 1934, I wired Colonel Taylor and had a telegram from Kathlyn Burch, secretary, stating:

Colonel Taylor out of city. Checked back over record and find stenographic error in listing ALLGOOD's record. He voted "yes" for RANKIN's widows and orphans bill.

If it was an error, it was a grievous one. It does seem to me that voluntary information of this importance should have been doubly checked before being released by a man heading so powerful a lobby as Colonel Taylor. I cannot, of course, prove collusion on this matter. However, collusion is implied, because Major Starnes, of Guntersville, Ala., announced for Congress almost the identical time this statement was published by the Alabama Legionnaire. Major Starnes should have checked my vote on such important matters with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD before he used it for political advertisement. You can take a few drops of ink and darken a gallon of water. The same principle holds true in a political campaign. A misstatement of the above nature will poison the minds of hundreds of voters. The leaders of the American Legion in my congressional district also laid great stress on the President's economy bill. Please note they named it the "President's" economy bill. The truth of the matter is the American Legion leaders are disgruntled with President Roosevelt's stand on veteran legislation and are and will continue to do everything in their power to defeat Members of Congress who voted for the economy bill. They will also do everything in their power to defeat our President for reelection in 1936. The influence of the American Legion alone, however, did not defeat me. The Republicans of my district played as important part in my defeat as did the American Legion. There are eight counties in my district, and a Republican primary is held in but one, which is De Kalb. The Republicans in the other counties came into the primaries by the hundreds. During the six terms I have been in Congress I have always had Republican opposition. My Republican opponents in the general elections received from ten to fifteen thousand votes. In Randolph and Cleburne Counties the vote is about equally divided between the Democrats and Republicans.

Two years ago the chairman of the Democratic executive committee in Randolph County requested me to make some speeches in the county to help elect the local Democratic ticket. I did so. Last year charges were brought against a Republican postmaster at Roanoke, who is the brother of the chairman of the Republican State executive committee. I helped to oust the Republican from office. In the run-off primary the Republicans in these two counties remembered my activities along the above-mentioned lines and voted solidly against me.

In the first primary in Randolph County I received approximately 1,600 votes, former Senator Heflin received 1,000, and Major Starnes 900. In the run-off I still received 1,600 and Major Starnes 1,900. In other words, he received the entire Heflin vote, which was the Republican and independent vote. In Cleburne County in the first primary I received approximately 800 votes, former Senator Heflin 700, and Major Starnes 600. In the run-off primary I still received my 800 votes and Major Starnes received 1,300 votes.

The entire independent and Republican vote, which was at least 7,500 in this district, went to Starnes in the run-off. I was defeated by 2,000 votes. My vote over Major Starnes in the first primary was 2,300. The Republicans voted to defeat me in order to discredit the Roosevelt administration. Newspapers throughout the country have carried news items stating an Alabama Congressman who had supported Roosevelt had been defeated.

The Republican leaders in Alabama have shown heretofore their opposition to President Roosevelt's program. On July 10, 1933, Col. Oliver D. Street, of Guntersville, Ala., Republican national committeeman from Alabama, addressed letters to Republican officeholders and leaders throughout the entire State, stating:

> Frantic appeals are being made by the Democratic bosses to the people of Alabama to vote for repeal of the eighteenth amendment on the ground that it is a Democratic measure. The liquor lash is being laid hard on the backs of Democrats in a desperate effort to drive them to vote for liquor on the plea that President Roosevelt desires it. Well, if repeal is a Democratic measure and if Roosevelt desires it, this should be sufficient proof that it is not a Republican measure and no Republican has any business voting for it.

This statement shows the animus of the Republicans in Alabama against Democratic Congressmen and President Roosevelt's program. We should have a State law in Alabama which would require a voter to register in the general election giving his politics. If he votes a Republican ticket in November, he should not be allowed to vote in the Democratic primary the following year.

In making my last statement of 12 years of service as a Member of Congress from Alabama, only 15 months of which time was under a Democratic President, I will say I have supported every single relief measure advocated by President Roosevelt. I aided in putting over the cotton reduction program and the loan which caused cotton to rise from 6 to 12 cents a pound. Muscle Shoals is no longer a political football. The Tennessee Valley Authority is now developing this property and it will ultimately revolutionize our entire section. When President Roosevelt came to Alabama to make an inspection of this property, I accompanied him on his special train. And when the bill was signed creating the Tennessee Valley Authority I was given one of the pens used by the President.

During the past year I was instrumental in securing a soil-erosion project for Tallapoosa and Chambers Counties. More than a half million dollars will be spent on this project in the next 5 years. Three of the eight C.C.C. camps of the Interior Department in the State were located in my district.

For many years I have tried to get favorable action by the War Department to open the Coosa River. Last spring I attended a meeting at Gadsden, Ala., at which $900 was raised, and to which I contributed, to provide funds for an engineer to secure evidence to set aside an adverse report on the opening of the river. This adverse report has practically been set aside, and if my successor gives this matter the proper attention the Coosa River will be opened for navigation within a short time. I have been working for appropriations for post-office buildings, and am pleased to advise that $85,000 has been set aside to remodel the Gadsden office, $68,000 for building a Federal building at Fort Payne, $63,000 for a Federal building at Guntersville, and $65,000 for a Federal building at Roanoke. This is four projects for my district, and the entire State of Alabama has been allotted only seven in addition to the appropriations I secured for my district. I am still hopeful of securing an appropriation for a post office at Alexander City, Ala.

In conclusion, I will say that I received over 2,000 more votes in the run-off primary than was ever accorded me before. I feel confident that had the Republicans been barred I would have been nominated. I have no recrimination against the Democrats, and take this opportunity to thank my thousands of Democratic friends who stood so loyally by the Roosevelt administration in the recent primary.

NATIONAL MOTOR VEHICLES THEFT ACT

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 16

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed in the enrollment of the bill (S. 2845) entitled "An act to extend the provisions of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act to other stolen property" to strike out "1929" where it appears in section 7 thereof and to insert in lieu thereof "1919."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SPEAKER'S SUSPENSION LIST FOR MONDAY, MAY 21, 1934

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following suspension list for Monday next:

H.R. 7290 (Private, 818). A bill authorizing the President to present a gold medal to George M. Cohan.—Mr. KELLER (Mr. PEYSER).

H.J.Res. 341 (Union, 384). Joint resolution authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in the international celebration at Fort Niagara, N.Y.—Mr. ANDREWS of New York.

H.R. 7667 (Union, 314). A bill to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.—Mr. LEA of California.

S. 2692 (on table). A bill relating to the record of registry of certain aliens.—Mr. DICKSTEIN.

S. 3397. A bill to amend the laws relating to the length of tours of duty in the tropics and certain foreign stations in the case of officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and for other purposes.—Mr. SPENCE.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 211. An act for the relief of John A. Rapelye;

H.R. 276. An act to authorize the placing of a bronze tablet bearing a replica of the Congressional Medal of Honor upon the grave of the late Brig. Gen. Robert H. Dunlap, United States Marine Corps, in the Arlington National Cemetery, Va.;

H.R. 328. An act for the relief of E. W. Gillespie;

H.R. 473. An act for the relief of Irene Brand Alper;

H.R. 916. An act for the relief of C. A. Dickson;

H.R. 1197. An act for the relief of Glenna F. Kelley;

H.R. 1211. An act for the relief of R. Gilbertsen;

H.R. 1212. An act for the relief of Marie Toenberg;

H.R. 4516. An act for the relief of B. Edward Westwood;

H.R. 4533. An act for the relief of the widow of D. W. Tanner for expense of purchasing an artificial limb;

H.R. 4973. An act for the relief of G. C. Vandover;

H.R. 5284. An act for the relief of the Playa de Flor Land & Improvement Co.;

H.R. 5405. An act for the relief of Nicola Valerio; and

H.R. 5950. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 258. An act for the relief of Wallace E. Ordway;

S. 1982. An act to add certain lands to the Mount Hood National Forest in the State of Oregon;

S. 2080. An act to provide punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers;

S. 2249. An act applying the powers of the Federal Government, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to extortion by means of telephone, telegraph, radio, oral message, or otherwise;

S. 2252. An act to amend the act forbidding the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce;

S. 2253. An act making it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution in certain cases;

S. 2575. An act to define certain crimes against the United States in connection with the administration of Federal penal and correctional institutions and to fix the punishment therefor;

S. 2841. An act to provide punishment for certain offenses committed against banks organized or operating under laws of the United States or any member of the Federal Reserve System; and

S. 3364. An act for the relief of G. T. Fleming.

OLD-AGE PENSION

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 4548) to provide old-age securities for persons over 60 years of age residing in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and pending that motion I move that debate upon the bill do now close, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is out of order because time has already been allotted in the committee to certain gentlemen whose full time has not expired.

The SPEAKER. The House can close debate at any time after debate has been had in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to a division. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken and, on a rising vote, there were—ayes 110, noes 9.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because it shows that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is evident that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the House, pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 37, stands adjourned until Sunday, May 20, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m., for the purpose of holding commemoration services.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 44 minutes p.m.) the House, pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 37, adjourned until Sunday, May 20, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION

474. Under clause 2 of rule XXIV a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year 1934 in the sum of $7,500 and for the fiscal year 1935 in the sum of $306,550, amounting in all to $314,050 (H.Doc. No. 373), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. AYERS of Montana: Committee on Indian Affairs. H.R. 85. A bill to extend Federal aid to certain school districts in the State of North Dakota upon condition that the public-school buildings benefited shall be available to Indian children of Fort Berthold Indian Reservation; with amendment (Rept. No. 1658). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. AYERS of Montana: Committee on Indian Affairs. H.R. 7255. A bill for the relief of the Winnebago Indians residing in school district no. 17, Thurston County, State of Nebraska; with amendment (Rept. No. 1659). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. AYERS of Montana: Committee on Indian Affairs. H.R. 7256. A bill for the relief of the Omaha Indians residing in school district no. 16, Thurston County, State of Nebraska; with amendment (Rept. No. 1660). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

NOMINATION OF CADETS TO BE ENSIGNS IN THE COAST GUARD

As in executive session,

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, the graduating exercises of the Coast Guard Academy will be held within a few days. Five young men will be graduated from the academy, and their nominations to be ensigns in the Coast Guard have been sent to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce. From that committee I report favorably the nominations, and ask unanimous consent that, as in executive session, the nominations of these five young men be confirmed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if there will be any discussion about the confirmation of the nominations?

Mr. STEPHENS. I think not. I have conferred with the two leaders with regard to this matter. As I have said, the exercises will be held in a very few days, and it is desired that commissions may be presented to the young men on their graduation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is this the matter about which the Senator spoke to me yesterday?

Mr. STEPHENS. It is.

Mr. McNARY. For the RECORD, I suggest that the Senator make a statement touching the reasons why immediate action is desired.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, as I have said, the graduating exercises of the Coast Guard Academy will be held within a few days. There will be five graduates, and the nominations of those five young men to be ensigns in the Coast Guard have been sent to the Senate. The nominations promoting them from cadets to ensigns were referred to the Committee on Commerce, from which I have reported them favorably. I ask unanimous consent for the confirmation of the nominations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and the nominations will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The following-named cadets to be ensigns in the Coast Guard of the United States, to rank as such from May 28, 1934:
Walter Stephen Bakutis.
Edgar Vigo Carlson.
Thomas James Eugene Crotty.
Evor Samuel Kerr, Jr.
Clarence Milton Speight.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, in view of the circumstances, I ask that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nominations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MONTHLY REPORT OF FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the Federal Emergency Relief Administrator covering the period from February 1 to February 28, 1934, inclusive, which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram from Mrs. Ernest R. Grant, executive secretary, District Tuberculosis Association, dated Cincinnati, Ohio, May 17, 1934, embodying a resolution adopted by the National Tuberculosis Association favoring the making of appropriations for tuberculosis control and prevention, and the immediate erection of a new and adequate adult tuberculosis sanitarium in and for the city of Washington, D.C., staffed with the best available experts and provided with modern equipment, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from a committee of the Railroad Employees' National Pension Association, Fayette Chapter, No. 506, Lexington, Ky., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 3231) to provide a retirement system for railroad employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a petition of sundry citizens, being members of David J. O'Connell Auxiliary, No. 2264, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Ozone Park, N.Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates (bonus) of ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the New York League of Women Voters, Second Assembly District, Nassau County, N.Y., favoring the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City and Brooklyn, N.Y., praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the reunion of families separated from their near and dependent relatives abroad, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Woman's Missionary Society of Medina, N.Y., favoring the passage of House bill 6097, providing higher moral standards for films entering interstate and foreign commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens, being members of Albany Lodge, No. 861, Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees, Albany, N.Y., praying for the enactment of pending amendments to the Railway Labor Act, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Men's Club of Arcade, N.Y., favoring the passage of the bill (S. 3171) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by motor carriers operating in interstate or foreign commerce, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of several citizens of New York City, N.Y., praying for the passage of the so-called "Dunn bill", being the bill (H.R. 8520) to authorize the operation of stands in Federal buildings by blind persons, to create a bureau for the blind in the Post Office Department, to issue licenses to blind persons for the operation of such stands, and to supervise the same, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Mechanicville and vicinity, in the State of New York, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 3231) to provide a retirement system for railroad employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

COMPANY UNIONS—WORKING CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. WAGNER presented a resolution in the nature of a petition adopted at the annual session of the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, held in the Central Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, N.Y., composed of approximately 300 ministers, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas in recent months there has been a rapid growth in employer-dominated company unions and these unions have become a serious menace to the rights of the workers to organize into independent unions and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, rights which the social creed of the Methodist Episcopal Church declares employees should have, we petition our representatives in the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which will make it illegal for a corporation or company to intimidate, coerce, or unfairly influence their employees in any way to join an employer initiated, financed, or controlled organization dealing with wages, hours, and grievances relating to conditions of work.

HOME MODERNIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. WAGNER also presented a resolution adopted by the New York State League of Savings and Loan Associations at Buffalo, N.Y., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas a comprehensive program to modernize, rehabilitate, and repair American homes at this time would greatly contribute to the restoration of the building industry, would put hundreds of thousands of American workmen back to work, would put millions of idle dollars into circulation, and would restore depreciated values in the home real-estate market; and

Whereas the Federal administration is planning to promote such a campaign on an unprecedently large scale; and

Whereas the savings and loan associations of New York State are admirably equipped by experience and close contact with their 500,000 members, some 300,000 of whom own their own homes, to assume an important role in the successful promotion of such a modernization program: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the executive committee of the New York State League of Savings and Loan Associations inaugurate a campaign among its 240 member associations in every section of this State to set in motion at once a home-modernization program; that this campaign be carried on through these member associations to their 300,000 home-owning members; that every cooperation be extended between these member associations and their central banking institutions to make available sufficient capital to supply every need of the modernizing home owner; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the New York State Members of Congress, and to the Governor of New York State.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3040) to give the Supreme Court of the United States authority to make and publish rules in actions at law, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1049) thereon.

Mr. STEIWER, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H.R. 5597. An act to afford permanent protection to the watershed and water supply of the city of Coquille, Coos County, Oreg. (Rept. No. 1050);

H.R. 5823. An act to authorize the purchase by the city of McMinnville, Oreg., of certain tracts of public lands and certain tracts revested in the United States under the act of June 9, 1916 (39 Stat. 218) (Rept. No. 1051); and

H.R. 7185. An act to authorize the purchase by the city of Forest Grove, Oreg., of certain tracts of public lands and certain tracts revested in the United States under the act of June 9, 1916 (39 Stat. 218) (Rept. No. 1052).

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 3568) to amend section 824 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1053) thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 854) for the relief of the Ingram-Day Lumber Co., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1054) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3151) to cancel certain Government liens on lands within the King Hill Irrigation District, State of Idaho, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1055) thereon.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1510. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to adjust water-right charges, to grant other relief on the Federal irrigation projects, and for other purposes", approved May 25, 1926, with respect to certain lands in the Langell Valley Irrigation District (Rept. No. 1060); and

S. 3375. An act to provide for the distribution of power revenues on Federal reclamation projects, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1057).

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3499) for the relief of Michael Ilitz, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1056) thereon.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H.R. 2287. An act for the relief of Warren Burke (Rept. No. 1061);

H.R. 3167. An act for the relief of Sue Hall Erwin (Rept. No. 1062);

H.R. 3423. An act for the relief of Benjamin Wright, deceased (Rept. No. 1063); and

H.R. 4962. An act for the relief of Joseph B. Lynch (Rept. No. 1064).

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mr. LONERGAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 17th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 258. An act for the relief of Wallace E. Ordway;

S. 1982. An act to add certain lands to the Mount Hood National Forest in the State of Oregon;

S. 2080. An act to provide punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers;

S. 2249. An act applying the powers of the Federal Government, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to extortion by means of telephone, telegraph, radio, oral message, or otherwise;

S. 2252. An act to amend the act forbidding the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce;

S. 2253. An act making it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution in certain cases;

S. 2575. An act to define certain crimes against the United States in connection with the administration of Federal penal and correctional institutions and to fix the punishment therefor;

S. 2841. An act to provide punishment for certain offenses committed against banks organized or operating under laws of the United States or any member of the Federal Reserve System; and

S. 3364. An act for the relief of G. T. Fleming.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. STEPHENS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the nominations of several officers in the Coast Guard to be lieutenants (junior grade), to rank as such from the dates set opposite their names, as follows:

Ensign Harold A. T. Bernson, May 15, 1933;

Ensign George W. Dick, May 15, 1933; and Ensign Russell J. Roberts, June 7, 1933.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OVERTON:

A bill (S. 3639) for the relief of Joseph W. Ludlum and the estate of Oliver Keith Ludlum; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3640) granting the consent of Congress to the Tensas Basin Levee Board of the State of Louisiana to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across Bayou Bartholomew at or near its mouth in Morehouse Parish, La.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 3641) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3642) authorizing the survey, location, and construction of a highway to connect the northwestern part of continental United States with British Columbia, Yukon Territory, and the Territory of Alaska; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. WHEELER (by request):

A bill (S. 3643) authorizing certain employees in the Indian Service to administer oaths; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 3644) to provide for the assignment of a military instructor for the high-school cadets of Washington, D.C.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WHEELER (by request):

A bill (S. 3645) to conserve and develop Indian lands and resources; to establish a credit system for Indians; to provide for higher education for Indians; to extend toward Indians the right to form business and other organizations; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ECONOMIC CONDITION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, and request that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be received, referred as requested, and printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 124) authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation with respect to agricultural income and the financial and economic condition of agricultural producers generally

Whereas the decline in agricultural income and the unsatisfactory condition of agriculture and of those engaged therein is a matter of increasing concern to the Congress, and affects the general welfare of the Nation and its citizens; and

Whereas in recent years the agricultural income has decreased while the earnings and profits of concerns processing or dealing in certain lines of farm products have increased or declined only moderately; and

Whereas there has developed an increasingly large proportionate spread between the prices received by the farmer for his products and the prices paid therefor by the consumer; and

Whereas, according to the latest statistics of income published by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, 22 large corporations reported making over 45 percent of the gross sales of all corporations engaged in the processing and manufacture of food products in 1931, and 102 large corporations reported making 60 percent of the gross sales of such corporations; and

Whereas it is charged that monopolistic, oppressive, and unfair methods and practices of various middlemen, processors, manufacturers, packers, and handlers are in whole or in part responsible for the conditions above described, and that wasteful and uneconomic methods have contributed toward bringing about these conditions; and

Whereas it is charged that said various middlemen, processors, manufacturers, packers, handlers, and others have violated the various antitrust laws of the United States, that they have burdened, restricted, and restrained interstate and foreign commerce and adversely affected the volume and price of farm products moving in intrastate and foreign commerce; and

Whereas it is charged that many lines of processing or dealing in farm products are so dominated by a handful of large concerns as to impede the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce to the detriment of both the farmer and the consumer; and

Whereas it is charged that through the payment of high and excessive salaries and other devices said middlemen, processors, manufacturers, packers, and others escape just taxation by the United States, that said salaries tend unduly to diminish the tax revenues of the United States and tend to burden and restrain interstate and foreign commerce in farm products, and to divert and conceal the earnings and profits of the concerns paying said salaries, and that by various devices those receiving said salaries escape their just share of Federal taxation; and

Whereas it is believed that the Congress should consider whether new legislation should be enacted or existing legislation amended on any of the subjects hereinbefore described and in aid thereof should be informed on all of said subjects: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report at the next session of Congress:

First. (1) The extent of the decline in agricultural income in recent years, including the amount and percentage of such decline;

(2) The extent of the increases or decreases in recent years in the income of the principal corporations and other manufacturers and/or processors of the principal farm products, as compared with the decline in agricultural income, including the amount and percentage of such changes;

(3) The proportion of total consumer cost of representative products manufactured or processed from the principal farm products which is represented by the proceeds received by (a) the farmer, (b) the manufacturers and processors, and (c) the distributors of such principal farm products and such representative products manufactured therefrom.

Second. The financial position of the principal corporations engaged in the manufacturing, processing, distribution, and marketing of the representative major products manufactured from such principal farm products, including—

(1) The capitalization and assets of such corporations and the means and sources of the growth of such capitalization and assets.

(2) The investment, costs, profits, and rates of return of such corporations.

(3) The salaries of the officers of such companies.

(4) The extent to which said corporations avoid income taxes, if at all, and the extent to which officers receiving such salaries paid income taxes thereon.

Third. The extent of concentration of control and of monopoly in the manufacturing, processing, distribution, and marketing of representative major farm products which is maintained or has been obtained by any corporation or other organization, including—

(1) Methods and devices used by such corporations for obtaining and maintaining their control or monopoly of the manufacturing, marketing, processing, and distribution of such commodities, and the proportion of any such major farm commodity handled by each of the large units involved.

(2) The extent to which fraudulent, dishonest, unfair, and injurious methods are employed in the grading, warehousing, and transportation of such farm products, including combinations, monopolies, price fixing, and manipulation of prices on the commodity exchanges.

Fourth. The extent to which the cooperative agencies have entered into the processing and marketing of representative major farm products and the general effects of such cooperative agencies upon the producer and consumer.

5. The extent to which other countries have adopted or promoted processing and marketing agencies of a public, quasi-public or cooperative sort for the simplification and cheapening of the processing and marketing of agricultural products, and other administrative agencies which may have been set up for the protection of the farmer-producer and the consumer.

6. Any conclusions and/or recommendations with regard to increasing the income of farm producers or other recommendations with regard to the improvement of the economic position of farmers or consumers growing out of the inquiry.

SEC. 2. The Department of Agriculture, the National Recovery Administration, the Department of Justice, and other agencies of the Government are directed to cooperate with the Commission in such inquiry to the fullest extent possible.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution the Federal Trade Commission shall have the same right to obtain data and to inspect income-tax returns as the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and to submit any relevant or useful information thus obtained to the Congress or to either House thereof.

SEC. 4. For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the Federal Trade Commission, the Attorney General, and the courts of the United States shall have and may exercise all of the powers and jurisdiction severally conferred upon them by the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes", approved September 28, 1914.

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, which shall be available for expenditure as the Federal Trade Commission may direct, for expenses and all necessary disbursements, including salaries, in carrying out this resolution and prosecuting litigation necessary in aid of the powers conferred hereunder.

SEC. 6. The Federal Trade Commission is directed to present an interim report to the Congress on January 1, 1935, describing the progress made and the status of its work hereunder, and a final report with recommendations for legislation not later than July 1, 1935.

SALE OF ARMS AND MUNITIONS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution and ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is an administration resolution. A similar joint resolution will be introduced in the House on Monday by Mr. MCREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee. I should like to have the joint resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 125) to prohibit the sale of arms or munitions of war in the United States under certain conditions was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Joint resolution to prohibit the sale of arms or munitions of war in the United States under certain conditions

Resolved, etc., That if the President finds that the prohibition of the sale of arms and munitions of war in the United States to those countries now engaged in armed conflict in the Chaco may contribute to the reestablishment of peace between those countries, and if after consultation with the governments of other American republics and with their cooperation, as well as that of such other governments as he may deem necessary, he makes proclamation to that effect, it shall be unlawful to sell, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war in any place in the United States to the countries now engaged in that armed conflict, or to any person, company, or association acting in the interest of either country, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

SEC. 2. Whoever sells any arms or munitions of war in violation of section 1 shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 2 years, or both.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I submit an amendment to the pending measure. It is very brief and I ask that it may be printed, printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WALSH to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, viz:

On Page 6, line 6, after the words "public notice", to insert "of at least 10 days", so as to read:

SEC. 4. Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, public notice of at least 10 days of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, etc.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

Mr. NORRIS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 29) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the popular election of President and Vice President of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXPENSES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATION OF MUNITIONS INDUSTRY

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, since the formation of the committee to investigate the munitions industry, there has been a very general and decided opinion by the committee members that not a sufficient amount of money has been provided to carry on the investigation. Originally $50,000 was requested. At the time of the adoption of the resolution the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate granted $15,000. As a result of a meeting of the special committee this afternoon, we were unanimous in authorizing the introduction of the resolution which I send to the desk at this time. I ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 244), as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Vice President, under authority of Senate Resolution 206, agreed to April 12, 1934, to investigate the munitions industry, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $35,000 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized to be expended for the purposes set forth in said resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

SILVER IN OUR MONETARY SYSTEM—ADDRESS BY SENATOR PITTMAN

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD a most instructive and interesting address delivered before the Academy of Political Science on March 21, 1934, on the subject of Silver in Our Monetary System, by Hon. KEY PITTMAN, senior Senator from Nevada, who is recognized not only by his fellow Senators but by all students of monetary questions as an authority on monetary problems.

Senator PITTMAN's study of these problems has extended through a long and notable career in the United States Senate and has taken him to all the important countries of both Europe and Asia.

Senator PITTMAN is recognized as one of the ablest, most energetic, and influential of the advocates of the restoration of silver to its historic place in world finance. His efforts in behalf of this cause have been continuous and consistent. He has never hesitated or faltered in his devoted efforts and has always held the admiration and respect of all those who have disagreed with or opposed him.

The country now seems almost assured at the present session of Congress of silver legislation of greater importance and value than has been enacted for over 50 years. Much of the credit for this accomplishment will be due to the adroit, able, and scholarly leadership of Senator PITTMAN.

This address by this international monetary authority, and the leader to whom we are indebted for the international silver agreement resulting from the recent world conference at London, will be found of great interest and value to all who are interested in monetary problems.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SILVER IN OUR MONETARY SYSTEM

By Hon. KEY PITTMAN, United States Senator from Nevada

Permit me to express my pleasure in the honor you have conferred upon me by giving me this opportunity to express very briefly my opinion on the subject of silver in our monetary system. I say "express my opinion", because in 20 minutes it is impossible to make a complete argument.

The question is not whether we shall establish silver as a part of our monetary system, but whether we shall remove the restrictions that now exist as to the use of silver and permit its operation as currency and metallic base to the fullest extent.

At the present time, in approximate figures, our total currency is around $9,000,000,000. Of this amount a little over $800,000,000 is silver currency. I am attempting in this brief statement to avoid dealing in exact statistics. I hope, rather, to express the principle underlying my opinion.

I am quite conscious of the general belief in high economic circles, and among many of the peoples of the world, that silver is in the nature of a fiat currency, and, to say the least, but a monetary token.

For over 50 years in nearly all the great nations of the world gold has been maintained as the sole money and monetary base. It has therefore come to be considered as the only sound and safe money. I have no desire that this base shall be disturbed. It has proved to be an accurate measure of national and international values. It has served as a national measure of values and a restriction upon the unlimited issue of currency and credit. It is, of course, entirely unnecessary here to discuss the definitions of money and its functions.

In brief, however, money has been invented to serve two great purposes, namely, to provide a reservoir of surplus earnings and to function as a medium of exchange. The stability of money is most important with respect to its function as a reservoir of surplus earnings. A change in the value of money as an exchange medium is subject to compensation and is, therefore, of less importance.

A man dies and leaves to his heirs in the form of money a part of the savings of his lifetime. He hoped these savings would forever have the same exchange value as those things which he had denied himself. He believed, and had a right to believe, that the value of his money was natural and was not subject, therefore, to destruction through the vagaries or vicissitudes of governments. This belief was not blind faith. It was based upon and supported by the immutable laws of nature.

Metallic money was not the invention of any monetary financial or governmental genius. It was simply an evolution of nature. At the dawn of civilization men traded those things that they did have for those things which they did not have. This form of barter and trade was the first step in the evolution of commerce and an advancement in the standard of living. The exchange was limited by production, distances, and facilities for transportation. Neighbors found no difficulty in trading that which they produced, but the necessity for long transportation made it impossible to acquire many varied products. A measure of value of products became essential to overcome these limitations.

Producers discovered that a chunk of metal called "gold" was very rare and, by reason of this quality, was desirable. They termed it a "precious metal." One man would trade a sheep for this chunk of metal and another man would trade a cow, which contained 10 times as much food product, for 10 of these chunks of metal. And so gold became a medium for the measure of values and the exchange of products.

No government then declared that it was legal tender that could be tendered and must be accepted in payment for debts or in settlement of contracts of sale. The function of gold as money was based upon the confidence of those who used it, that it was a rare and precious metal, and so it was and is, a rare and, therefore, precious metal. It may seem a strange thing that it is rare. There is no human reason why there is not as much gold in existence as there is iron, but the history of the ages has proven that there is not.

Since the dawn of civilization it has been sought by all peoples. They have risked their lives in hard and dangerous countries; they have fought for it. Yet its production has been limited by nature, as has been the production of human beings and commerce. Both have increased, and yet both have been limited by nature. Such is the history of the origin, production, and use of gold as money. These facts are known either consciously or subconsciously by all peoples, even including our professors. Living professors, unfortunately, were born, were educated, have studied, and have existed in the modern gold-standard era. Most of them will trust nothing but nature, realizing the fallibility of the human intellect and human character. Strange to say, the same reasons that actuate them with regard to gold do not impress them with regard to silver, and yet the occurrence, production, and use of silver have been just as natural and just as limited by ratio as gold. Every argument that may be used in support of the gold standard extends to and applies with equal force to silver as a basic money.

Silver has always been recognized as a precious metal, not so rare as gold, not so precious, and, therefore, the money of the masses of the peoples of the world. Gold was the money of the monarch, the nobleman and the government; silver was the money of the peasant, the laborer, and the smaller trader. And, so, down through the ages the relative occurrence, production, and use of these two precious metals move. The history of the occurrence, production, and uses of these precious metals is clear. For over 400 years the statistics with regard to the facts attending such occurrence, production, and use are quite accurate.

It may seem strange, almost miraculous, that during all this period there has only been a small quantity of gold produced and a small quantity of silver, and that the relative production during all that period was approximately 15 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold.

Not more than 1,000,000,000 ounces of gold have been produced in the world since the beginning of history. Few know how small a quantity of gold there is in existence, and no one seems to realize it. Everybody, however, knows there is not enough to go around. How about silver? All monometallists who have spoken or written seem to think that the law of preciousness which applies to gold does not apply to silver. They constantly intimate that there is some great supply of silver somewhere which some day will flood the world if silver is restored to its monetary uses. As a matter of fact, the production of silver has not exceeded 15,000,000,000 ounces. There has been, of course, a tremendous depletion through abrasion, loss, and destruction of both of these metals; and today, allowing for these factors, we may only estimate the amount of gold and silver in existence. No matter what factors may be used or what estimates may be made, both metals are extremely scarce and both are entitled to the definition of precious metals.

There are other reasons besides their preciousness that gave these metals their function as money. They are practically indestructible. They always have been and are now found everywhere throughout the world in the same limited quantities and natural ratios. They were acceptable, therefore, everywhere as money.

About 400 years ago banks were originated to facilitate the transfer of money. These institutions added greatly to the safety, convenience, transfer, and velocity of money.

These banks did not defile, injure, and depreciate the value of gold and silver money, but greatly added to their functions as media of exchange. It was not until governments attempted artificially to affect the functions of gold and silver as money that the natural conditions became disturbed.

Napoleon attempted to determine and fix the ratio of value between gold and silver. The result of his studies and his acts was to fix the ratio at approximately 15½ to 1. Subsequently Great Britain arbitrarily fixed the ratio of value at approximately 16 to 1. Silver, therefore, had a greater value relative to gold in France than in England. So the final result was that gold moved to England and silver moved to France and to other countries that followed France's example. The selfish element then interposed, and England, having quantities of gold, simply said, "From now on gold and gold alone shall be the full legal tender money of England and its measure of value." Such action, of course, diminished the demand for silver but not sufficiently to affect it materially, as the rest of Europe refused to follow the action of Great Britain. And we find still that the new relativity of value of gold and silver moves on until after the Franco-Prussian War, and then large quantities of gold moved into Germany from France as war indemnities.

Governmental cupidity moved Germany to establish the gold standard. This action was followed by other countries, including the United States in 1873. These acts again reduced the demand for and depreciated the value of silver. Those governments that had large reserves of gold were benefited, while those governments that had large reserves of silver were injured. These acts, however, were not sufficient to be destructive of monetary standards because all governments, by parity acts, maintained to a limited extent the monetary qualities of silver and its legal-tender functions.

Then came the post-war management of money. Germany, burdened with an artificial debt, abandoned all hope of anchoring its currency and credit system to either gold or silver and proceeded with an unmanageable currency which proved the absurdity to which managed currency might go. Conservative France, now a protector of gold and the gold standard, depreciated its own gold-standard currency 80 percent. But why go further? This history is common knowledge. Great Britain abandoned the gold standard. We abandoned the gold standard. The result was inevitable. The exchange value of currencies depreciated, and then various countries abandoned the gold standard and threw off all restraint in currency issues.

This depreciation of the exchange value of currencies invited purchases in countries having depressed currencies, and so money became a weapon of commercial exploitation instead of a measure of values.

The great lesson learned from this experience is that nature is sounder than the human intellect and that the immutable laws of nature alone may be trusted. It has dealt a death blow, in my opinion, to the theory of a managed currency not based on gold or silver. It has demonstrated the impossibility of any stability in international exchange where currencies are based on artificial rather than natural foundations. We have got to get back to the natural, age-long, accepted metallic base for money. The desired result can never be accomplished through an international conference until the most powerful governments in the world agree on the base. Such an agreement will be reached through necessity, and then money will cease to be used as a commercial weapon and will be restored to its function as a measure of values in domestic and international commerce.

But I have drifted away from the subject assigned to me—silver in our monetary system. Silver is now and always has been a part of our monetary system. Our monetary system was established on bimetallism. This system was not changed until 1873, when we adopted monometallism. The act in itself, as far as the establishment of a single standard of measure is concerned, had little disturbing effect. A provision of the act, however, which discontinued the coinage of standard silver dollars, was a violent attack upon the natural demand for silver. Its free and full functions as money were destroyed, and, of course, there naturally followed a depression in its demand and, therefore, its value.

Learned economists state that silver is only a commodity. Of course, that is true; but it is equally true that gold is only a commodity. Neither one of them, as commodities, if their use for monetary purposes were destroyed, would be as valuable, in my opinion, as iron. These same learned scholars would say that the value of gold is stable, while the value of silver is unstable. When the chief value of anything is destroyed by governmental action it becomes unstable. Recent events have caused us to wonder whether or not even the commodity value of gold is stable.

I am not at liberty to argue further the question of the respective merits of the gold standard, bimetallism, the silver standard, or managed currencies. I am assuming for the purpose of this argument that at the present time—and possibly for ages—the fallibility of the human mind requires a natural check such as a metallic base for currency issues. Then the question arises whether we shall need both metals in the future as we have in the past with the exception of sporadic periods of governmental interference.

I hold to the position that there is not sufficient gold in existence to supply the need of specie money. I hold that there is not sufficient gold in existence to redeem paper currencies or contracts payable in gold. There was sufficient gold for these purposes as long as people believed there was. Now they know there is not enough, and therefore there is not enough. As long as peoples did not demand payments in gold there was ample gold. When peoples and governments realized there was not enough gold to go around, then all tried to obtain gold regardless of others' losses and transfers, and redemptions in gold had to cease.

I cannot conceive, however, that this condition absolutely prevents the maintenance of the gold-standard measure of the domestic and exchange value of currencies. If the chief governments of the world maintain gold in their treasuries or central banks at an agreed ratio to their currencies and utilize such gold for the payment of trade balances, it will, in my opinion, serve every purpose of the gold standard of the past. Even this use, however, will be a strain upon the gold reserves of the world.

Five countries have possession of probably two thirds of the gold of the world. This maldistribution cannot be maintained if there is to be a successful gold-standard measure. There must be a redistribution through either commercial or monetary action. In any event, the strain upon this gold reserve is inevitable.

Now, if gold is to be utilized solely in such capacity what is to be the basis of a sound and limited domestic currency? I know of no alternative except a managed domestic currency or a domestic currency based upon the precious metals. Gold will have to be used, on the theory that I have in mind, for the stabilization of international exchange and as a limitation upon currency issues. Silver, in my opinion, should be in part and largely the basis of currency issues for domestic purposes. It will not be an experiment. We have always used silver as specie currency and as a basis for currency issue. In 1900, for instance, over 30 percent of our currency was silver currency. Today it is less than 12 percent, taking any basis for the value of gold that you see fit. We could extend our silver currency in this country, if it were deemed necessary, by $1,800,000,000 and still it would not be in excess of the ratio of silver currencies to other currencies that existed in 1900. And, mind you, that estimate is based upon a valuation of 23.2 grains of gold to the dollar or $20.67 an ounce. If we should maintain the parity of silver and gold, then we could increase over 40 percent the silver-currency issue of this country without disturbing the ratio.

Our silver currency today is backed by 100 percent silver, while our Federal Reserve notes were backed by 40 percent gold. There are only credits now back of such notes. The parity value of our standard silver dollar today is $1.29, or was before the recent gold action of our Government. I do not know what it is now. The intrinsic value of our standard dollar measured by the world price of silver is 35 cents. In other words, while there was 40-percent gold back of the Federal Reserve notes there is today 35 percent back of our standard silver dollar. The intrinsic value back of our silver currency will inevitably increase rather than decrease and probably will reach 100 percent.

Whether we agree or not as to the soundness and safety of silver specie and currency we must agree that it provides a natural limitation for currency issues. There are only 12,000,000,000 ounces of silver in existence, according to the best estimates. At least, 6,000,000,000 of these ounces are hoarded in India and 2,000,000,000 similarly hoarded in China. This hoarded silver will not fly from India or China. Such is the age-long history of the movement of silver. When the world price of silver was above $1 an ounce in 1918, 1919, and 1920, the people of India and China purchased two thirds of the silver produced in the world during that period of time. Silver is their measure of wealth. It is the thing that they cherish above everything on earth. It is the thing that they pass down to their descendants; and the more valuable it becomes, the more they desire it, seek it, and hoard it.

Over 13 governments of the world carry over 30 percent of silver reserves in their treasuries and central banks.

There are bills pending in Congress looking to the acquisition of silver by our Government. All these bills have a sound and good purpose. None of them, in my opinion, will bring into our Treasury reserves as much silver as their proponents hope for. Economists of China threatened to place an embargo upon the export of silver if the United States adopted any act tending to raise the price of silver. India has limited the sale of government silver to a total of 140,000,000 ounces during a period of 4 years. Then India will have no redundant silver and will cease to sell silver.

And, so, it must be evident that a silver basis for domestic currency will be a limitation upon the issue and that probably is the most important factor with regard to currency issues. The use of silver by the great commercial countries of the world will undoubtedly stabilize its exchange value as the exchange value of gold was stabilized prior to the recent crisis.

It is extremely important in our commerce that the exchange value of silver should be stabilized. Over half of the people of the world have silver money, and only silver money, with which to purchase in other countries. When the exchange value of this silver money is extremely low, they are unable to purchase in countries such as ours. In fact, China, as an illustration, has ceased to purchase from the United States all forms of manufactured articles that it may dispense with and is rapidly becoming highly industrialized through the protection afforded to Chinese manufacturing institutions by the depreciated exchange value of silver. The Chinese banker and the Chinese industrialist are gratified by this situation. The Chinese Government, on the other hand, cannot pay its foreign debts or establish credit or develop China under such conditions. The London Conference realized this. The conference unanimously adopted the American resolution promising that the 66 participant governments would abandon the practice and policy of melting up silver coins, would replace low-valued paper currency with silver coins, and would refrain in the future from legislation that would depreciate the value of silver in the world market. The adoption of this resolution, of course, was based upon the consummation of the agreement among five governments whose countries were large producers of silver and three governments whose countries were holders and users of large quantities of silver. The latter agreement has been ratified by 6 of the 8 governments, and there is hardly any question but that the other two will ratify.

I call your attention to this fact solely for the purpose of indicating the attitude of the 66 governments of the world toward silver for monetary purposes. We in the United States are more interested in the exchange value of silver than probably any other country, unless it be Great Britain. We cannot look to Europe with much optimism for future export trade. Europe has followed our example and is utilizing every expedient to protect its own markets against imports. China and South America are now, and will be for many generations, our natural export markets. They cannot buy from us at our prices so long as we hold down to so low a point the exchange value of their silver money. No matter what standards of money the governments have, the people have only silver with which to make purchases.

Some economists contend that we can only raise and stabilize the exchange value of silver moneys in the world through international agreement. That was undoubtedly true at one time. The world, however, has moved faster than these economists have grown. Today the United States is a creditor nation, and because of that fact, and in view of the consideration that so many nations desire the restoration and stabilization of the price of silver, our Government can accomplish this alone. There are many methods through which we may accomplish it. I would support any of the plans offered. All these plans grant discretion to the Government to prevent any sudden rise in the price of silver which might disrupt national monetary systems or existing contracts.

Our Government today, by virtue of the fact that it possesses one third of the monetary gold of the world, is in a splendid strategic position to bring about the restoration of the gold-standard measure of international exchange. It is through this power, and through this power alone, that the restoration of the gold standard can be accomplished. It will also be of great advantage for this Government to have a large silver reserve so that it may have influence in the stabilization of silver currencies throughout the world.

It is my hope, therefore, that our Government may not only maintain its silver reserves and its silver currency but that it will enlarge and fortify such reserves and aid in the stabilization of currencies throughout the world.

ADDRESS BY POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY BEFORE WASHINGTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interesting and able address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, Postmaster General, before the Washington Chamber of Commerce, Wednesday evening, May 16, 1934.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President and members of the Washington Chamber of Commerce, it is a pleasure to me to speak to those who, in a real sense, direct the business and civic life of our beautiful Capital City. Administrations come and go, but you remain the custodians of the business of this great city; the leaders of city opinion and city conscience; and let me tell you, yours is no mean responsibility. The prosperity of half a million people is to a large degree in your hands, for, unless business is conducted efficiently and people get an adequate return for what they spend, your community will languish. Prosperity does not mean merely greater profits for the merchants. I think the lesson that a contented and thriving community is a necessary element in the success of every sort of industry has been thoroughly learned in every section of the country. It is as pertinent to Washington as to any great manufacturing or trading center. It is as much up to you to make business here a model for business throughout our country as it is to make the city government a model for all municipalities. Perhaps neither ideal has been realized, but it is something to strive for, and the nearer it is approached the more all of us will benefit.

I am aware of the fine efforts your body has made in the past. I know how much the beauty of this city has been enhanced and advanced by your insistence on such projects as the fulfillment of the dream of those who saw Pennsylvania Avenue as the most impressive boulevard of any world capital. I know how large a part you played in the great Mall project; in the erection of splendid bridges and memorials and in the development of a more complete park system. Your success in these enterprises should be an inspiration to all, for it indicates the vast influence you can exercise not only for your city's benefit but for the satisfaction of the entire Nation.

You occupy a great vantage point. Really you are sitting in the grandstand while the procession of Presidents, Congresses, Cabinet officers, and the rest of Government marches by. We come here, play our part, and go away. Yours is the continuing body, charged with watching over the interests of the Capital City, which is the pride of the whole United States.

Washington is to be congratulated on many things. While every city and every part of the country felt the depression, that, happily, is receding into the background, with the ranks of the unemployed becoming less, Washington did not feel this as keenly as other cities. Elsewhere you saw great mills and factories shut down, throwing hundreds of men and women out of employment and into the bread lines. You saw large buildings and stores almost empty and great hotels with few paying guests. In Washington even during the worst of the depression this was not as acute. Since March 4 of last year your hotels have seen a rapid rise in business, until today the difficulty is not vacant rooms but to find a vacant room. It is my information that this improvement in business applies to all lines of trade in this thriving city, which today is in the limelight of the Nation—in fact, of the world—as perhaps at no other time in our history, for the eyes of almost everyone have been turned to Washington for hope, guidance, and a renewal of their faith, and the ability of our Nation to again give to the people of America confidence not only in our institutions of government but in our institutions of commerce and industry. Instead of decreasing, the number of Federal employees in Washington has steadily increased during the present administration, due to the various emergency agencies. I feel certain that any effect your merchants might have felt from the necessary cuts under the Economy Act have been more than offset during the past year by the rapidly increasing number of persons on the Federal pay roll in Washington. One has only to go into some of your large stores and commercial buildings to realize that the shadows of the depression, so far as the District of Columbia is concerned, are faint. Your great buildings continue to rent offices. If I am correctly informed, most of your hotels are filled to overflowing.

Of course you had your banking troubles which no part of the country escaped. You are, however, fortunate that banking is on a firm foundation in Washington today, with only 1 unlicensed bank remaining of the 13 which failed to receive licenses to reopen on March 14, 1933. I am informed this 1 unlicensed bank in the District had restricted deposits of $568,000 on May 1, 1934, which is only a little more than 1½ percent of the deposits tied up in the 13 unlicensed banks on March 14, last.

In this connection I think it is of interest and most timely to say a few words with reference to the banking situation in general. Remarkable progress has been made in the rehabilitation of the Nation's banking structure since March of last year, when it became necessary for the President to close every bank in the country. On March 16, 1933, the were 1,417 national banks which were not granted licenses to reopen, and these banks had some $2,208,000,000 in deposits. By the 1st of May this year, less than 14 months since the holiday, 1,232 of these 1,417 unlicensed national banks had been reopened, liquidated, absorbed by other national banks, or placed in receivership. Of the remaining 185 unlicensed national banks, 156 had plans for reorganization approved by the Comptroller of the Currency and 29 had disapproved plans. The deposits tied up in these 29 banks represent less than three quarters of 1 percent of the $2,208,000,000 tied up in all unlicensed national banks on March 16, 1933.

Another significant contrast is that since the banking holiday only seven national banks have closed their doors. There is a particular reason involved in connection with each of these, and I feel certain that if time had permitted a more careful investigation practically none of these seven would have reopened. However, it is my information that these seven banks paid their depositors in full, so, strictly speaking, there have been no bank failures during the present administration.

At some time nearly everyone either comes to Washington or wants to come, for who does not want to see the central fountain from which flow the streams of Government and Federal relief? Because of this each day finds thousands of tourists who liberally patronize your hotels, restaurants, theaters, and other places of business. Of course, many of these would come even though there were no organized effort on the part of this splendid organization, but you have not only added to the enjoyment and pleasure of your visitors but you have also made Washington the great convention city of America.

Yet aside from these group gatherings, every American wants to come to Washington. You have the advantage over the goals of other tourist armies in that there is an all-year-round pilgrimage. One of the reasons for this is that you have the country's most beautiful city. Thanks to the Government, your system of parks and museums is unequaled, and patriotic shrines like Mount Vernon, Arlington, the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, the Lincoln Memorial, the Capitol, the White House, and other interesting public buildings are all magnets which draw people here. These thereby contribute to the business health of the community.

Occasionally, of course, I have heard echoes of a complaint that the vast expense of Government real estate places an undue tax burden on private property. I have not the inclination to discuss with you what should be the logical amount contributed by the Government to the maintenance of the District. It is the most natural thing in the world that Washingtonians should feel that the Government is not paying its fair share. That is typical of every political subdivision in the country. We are all of us inclined to pay more attention to our disadvantages than to our advantages. My only idea in mentioning this subject is to point out that perhaps your griefs are not as intense as you think they are when you match them up with civic joys.

Chambers of commerce and trade associations have always been important in our commercial structure. For a long time they afforded the only protection the customer had against combinations and monopolistic tendencies. Perhaps they did not always function as they should have in this direction. But I think we can lay the blame for that on the business psychology of the time. Money was so plentiful while the country was filling up with people that it was always more or less customary to regard the public as an adversary to be exploited rather than a clientele to be pleased and encouraged. The philosophy that general prosperity was a vital element in individual prosperity was slow in working its way to recognition. Under the new deal, inaugurated by the present administration as part of the emergency correction, such organizations as yours have assumed a vastly enhanced importance. It is the theory of the President's recovery program that business should regulate itself. Under the codes the authority to deal with unfair trade practices, as well as the enforcement of the provisions in regard to wages and hours of labor, is vested in a body made up from the membership of each particular industry.

The Government is only represented by an individual whose function it is to guard against antisocial trends in business. He has no vote in the determination of policies, for business is supposed to make its own rules. He is really only there as a precaution against a possible return of the old habit of greed and grasping. For example, it is among the possibilities that the more powerful among the membership in any given industry might seek to oppress the lesser membership. This has happened before and human nature does not change overnight. In such a case the Government's representative has what amounts to a veto power. The less this power has to be exercised, the happier everyone will be, for despite the protests of some who, I am glad to say, are decidedly in the minority, and who resent any effort to control their greed, the Government is anxious that business surrender only those functions that are absolutely necessary to meet the existing emergency.

One interesting development of the new deal is the circumstance that where people eminent in industry have been called in to assist the Government in forming and administering the codes they have functioned helpfully and unselfishly. In fact, in the building of the various codes, such organizations as this have been most helpful and have cooperated splendidly with representatives of business and industry in this important work. I think it is safe to say that the participation in government of those prominent in business is an insurance against such practices as would compel Federal interference with the enactments of the code authorities.

I know there are some people who seem to believe that our emergence from the period of grief and stress might have occurred anyhow; that by some unknown process business would have worked out of its paralysis even had there been no N.R.A. or A.A.A. or any of the numerous agencies by which people were put to work, homes and farms were saved from mortgage foreclosures, and the spirit of fear replaced by renewed hope and confidence. By the same sort of reasoning it might be argued that a person desperately ill might have recovered without surgical and medical treatment. We know that in the case of sick business the patient is convalescing under the new deal, and I believe there are few among you who would be willing to have the doctor cease his ministrations and trust to luck that business could go the rest of the way toward recovery on its own account.

As a business man I welcome this opportunity to discuss with business men problems with which you are familiar and in which you are vitally interested. Especially am I glad to talk to you about the Post Office Department—one of the largest business enterprises in the world. Many of our problems of the Post Office Department are your problems; and while we think we have been doing a pretty good job, we do not assume to have all the knowledge. We welcome suggestions and constructive criticism as to how we can improve postal service. There never was an institution so perfectly run that it could not be made better.

It was my desire when I came into the Post Office Department to try to run it efficiently, and, if possible, to balance the budget. It has been found difficult to make the Department entirely self-supporting, though this was possible at times, particularly in the period from 1911 to 1919, with the exception of 2 years. Since 1919, however, there has been, until March 4, 1933, a steadily growing deficit which in 1932 amounted to the staggering net sum of $152,246,188.

I am not prepared to make a definite statement, but I really believe, if business conditions improve for the remaining 3 months of the fiscal year as they have for the past 3 months, that the revenue of the Post Office Department will be sufficient to cover our expenditures and we will have a truly balanced budget.

I realize that what the public expects from the Post Office Department more than anything else is service, but there is no reason why, in rendering efficient service, the taxpayers may not at the same time expect our Department to strive to live within its income. To do otherwise is in reality a double tax upon the public. Postage fees are actually an indirect tax, and we of the Department believe that when such a tax has been placed upon the people it is our duty to so conduct the affairs of the Department that if it is possible there will be no deficit and no need for Congress to call upon the taxpayers to make further payments for the conduct of the Post Office Department.

Of course, of equal importance to that of service and a balanced budget is the maintenance of a policy of fairness and justice at all times to the personnel of the Post Office Department, for the new deal must at all times be a square deal.

I am not unmindful of my responsibilities along this line, for in normal times the Post Office personnel constitutes approximately half of Federal civilian employees. I have been forcibly struck with the loyalty and devotion of the postal workers and am vitally interested in seeing to it that they are justly compensated for the service they are so unselfishly and conscientiously rendering. During the past year, in order that the Department might get on a sound basis and live within its income, it has been necessary to call upon these workers to accept furloughs and pay cuts that meant real sacrifice on their part. They have accepted these in the finest possible spirit without any letting up of their devotion to the Department and determination to serve the public in that manner which is a priceless heritage of the Department.

I am very happy to say that increases in postal revenues, which I interpret as a good barometer of improved business conditions, make it possible to relieve postal workers of these reductions and to again put to work a large body of postal substitutes who have endured an unusually large share of these sacrifices. Of course this will mean more deliveries with more men and women at work, and better all-round service, and you as the representatives of the business of our Capital City will benefit in more ways than one.

When the Benjamin Franklin station moves to the new Post Office Department Building there will be in the heart of your city the last word in a postal station, with the finest and most up-to-date equipment and all-night service.

Washington has more than an ordinary interest in Air Mail Service, a subject that has been very much in the limelight this year. I know that you business men of the Capital City are deeply interested in the present status of this, particularly in the improved service which will be given to Washington under the new system that is rapidly being completed. Contracts have been awarded on 17 routes and service is in operation on most of these. Considering the air mail from a national standpoint, the new system will service 19 additional cities and 4 States which had no service when the contracts were annulled, namely, Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, and West Virginia.

Improved service will be given to the States of Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, South Carolina, Georgia, Minnesota, South Dakota, North Dakota, Tennessee, Arkansas, Texas, New Mexico, Wyoming, Montana, and Washington. Forty-six States will receive direct air-mail service under the new system.

When the contracts were annulled the route mileage in operation was 25,248 miles. The new system will service 28,548 miles, an increase of 3,300 miles. The cost of air-mail service for the fiscal years 1932 and 1933 in round numbers was nearly $20,000,000. The cost for the new service, including the increased mileage of 3,300 miles over that being served when the contracts were annulled, is estimated to be not over $9,500,000. This indicates that the new system will cost the taxpayers from eight to ten million dollars less than was being paid 2 years ago.

Washington will be served by the old routes from Newark to Miami, Newark to Atlanta, and Washington to Detroit, and, in addition, by two new routes which have not heretofore existed—a direct route to Chicago through Charleston, W.Va., Cincinnati, Ohio, and Indianapolis, Ind., and a direct route from Washington, via Lynchburg, Va., and Nashville and Memphis, Tenn., to Texas, the Southwest, and Mexico. With the establishment of the schedules contemplated, all but two States in the Union will have either direct service into Washington or connecting routes leading directly into Washington, and the Nation's Capital, in turn, will have air-mail-service connections to all but two States in the Union, and these States have large cities which are in close proximity to air-mail lines.

An example of the improved service which may be expected is the trip made on May 13 from Los Angeles to New York by an air-mail plane in the record time of 11 hours and 31 minutes. The contractors assure the Department that the equipment which will be used on the routes giving service to Washington and the balance of the country will soon be superior to any in use prior to the cancelation of the contracts. Within a short while Eastern Air Lines, Inc., intends to use the new Douglas planes, and the Department has been informed that the Central Air Lines, Inc., will probably use the new Electra planes as soon as delivery can be made. The specifications on the route from Washington to Chicago and from Washington to Fort Worth provide for multimotored equipment.

The Army soon will have completed its work of carrying the air mail during the existing emergency. Their critics to the contrary notwithstanding, the service performed by the Army Air Corps will be to the everlasting credit of that unit. How well the Army was performing the task at the time it started to turn the service back to private operators is shown by the remarkable flight from San Francisco to New York on May 8 in 14 hours 8 minutes, the greater part of which was made in large bombers capable of transporting 2,000 pounds of mail or bombs.

Not one pound of air mail has been lost or destroyed, and the record is full of evidence of the heroic devotion to duty of Army pilots.

Gentlemen, I thank you for this opportunity to talk to your distinguished body, and for the privilege it has afforded me to discuss in this informal manner those things that are uppermost in our thoughts just now, and particularly to talk to you about the Post Office Department.

SUGAR BOUNTIES IN GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, about the 1st of March of this year, the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress prepared a report of interest to domestic sugar growers and processors on the operation of the sugar bounty in Great Britain. That report presents in detail some little-known facts about Great Britain's recent 10-year experiment in stimulating beet-sugar production through bounty payments made by the Government.

The report, which states that the question of whether subsidies are to be continued, is under consideration by the British Government, presents information with respect to the willingness of a country, long favorable to free trade, to pay the price required to stimulate sugar production at home under conditions in some respects less naturally adapted to production than those to be found in some of Great Britain's oversea possessions and on the European Continent. Presumably the policy looks toward some continuing home production of sugar without reference to any probability of complete self-sufficiency. It indicates that the average yield in England is 7 or 8 tons per acre in contrast to 9 to 13 tons per acre on the Continent, although climatic conditions in England permit later crops and a high sugar content in the beets; that during the crop years from 1924 to 1932 the subsidy paid to the sugar companies for beets was about £24,158,000, and that during the same period the sugar companies paid for the sugar beets about £29,176,000.

I ask that the article, which was submitted by Dr. Rita Dielmann for the Legislative Reference Service on February 26, 1934, may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Library of Congress, Legislative Reference Service]

SUGAR BOUNTIES IN GREAT BRITAIN

The backwardness of Great Britain in developing the sugar-beet industry was due to a number of circumstances: The industry on the Continent had got an early start and with the export bounty system and high tariffs, continental sugar could be sold cheaper in the English market than in the producing country; farmers were reluctant to grow sugar beets until factories were built to assure them a market, and capital was not attracted to the sugar industry because it was not certain that beets could be grown in England in sufficient quantities to make the operation of factories profitable. No aid could be expected from the Government, which had been a party to the Brussels Convention, 1903, by which it was agreed that no further subsidies should be granted to the sugar-beet industry.

The National Sugar Beet Association, established in 1910, encouraged beet growing by offering prizes. On August 1, 1912, the British Government gave formal notice of withdrawal from the Brussels Convention and opened the way for the establishment of the sugar-beet industry in England. The Board of Agriculture and Fisheries began a series of experiments under the direction of English technical and agricultural colleges to determine whether sugar beets could be grown profitably.[1]

The sugar-refining industry also met with difficulties in competing with continental refineries. In 1850 most of the sugar consumed in Great Britain was the product of home refineries; in 1885, 96 percent of the sugar was refined in England, but by 1902 the home refineries were producing only 29 percent of the sugar consumed.[2]

At the time of the World War about two thirds of the British sugar supply came from Germany, Austria-Hungary, Holland, and Denmark. The importation of sugar was prohibited lest even neutral sugar might be of enemy origin and shipping could not be spared to bring sugar from the colonies. The price of sugar rose from 1½ pence or 2 pence per pound to a shilling 2 pence per pound.[3]

In March 1917 the treasury sanctioned an advance to the British Sugar Beet Society of £125,000 as a loan for the development of the 5,000-acre Kelham estate. The Home Grown Sugar, Ltd., was chartered in 1920 with a capital of £500,000, half of which was subscribed by the Government.[4]

Early in 1922 the sugar-beet companies appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to grant a temporary remission of the excise tax or they would be forced to stop refining sugar and close their factories. On March 30, 1922, Sir Arthur Boscawen announced in the House of Commons in advance of the budget that in view of the exceptional circumstances of the new industry and the condition of unemployment in the country no excise duty would be charged on home-grown sugar under the finance bill to be presented to Parliament at that session.[5]

The first excise duty on sugar was levied in the Finance Act of 1915, when a tax of 7 shillings was imposed on sugar and 3 shillings 2 pence on molasses. At that time the tariff on sugar was 9 shillings 4 pence and molasses 4 shillings 3 pence the hundredweight. This gave home-manufactured sugar an advantage of 2 shillings 4 pence and molasses a shilling a penny over the imported products.[6] While both the tariff and the excise were raised in 1916 and in 1918, home-manufactured sugar continued to enjoy an advantage of 2 shillings 4 pence the hundredweight.[7]

The finance act, 1919, reduced the excise by one sixth, making the rate 19 shillings 5⅓ pence. The tariff on foreign sugar remained at 25 shillings 8 pence the hundredweight, giving the home product an advantage of 6 shillings 2⅔ pence.[8] It was against this state of affairs that the factories manufacturing home-grown sugar complained in 1922.

The finance act of that year granted a remission of the excise tax for 1 year and in 1923 the remission was extended for 1 more year.[9] The actual aid to the sugar industry was then 25 shillings 8 pence, the amount of tariff on foreign sugar. But the sugar manufacturers were not satisfied. Remission of the excise was an unstable form of assistance dependent upon the policy announced at each budget. The industry wanted more definite assistance over a period of years. Moreover, the finance act of 1924 lowered the tariff on sugar to 11 shillings 8 pence the hundredweight.[10]

The beet-sugar subsidy act of 1925 provided for the payment of a subsidy for 10 years to manufacturers that paid a minimum price of 44 shillings a ton for raw beets washed and topped and delivered to the factory and having a sugar content of 15½ percent as ascertained by the cold-water digestive method. For beets testing greater or less than 15½ percent there should be an addition to or deduction from the minimum price of 3 pence for each one tenth of 1 percent above or below the 15½ percent. This price was to be offered for beets grown in the years 1924 to 1927.

As a condition of receiving the subsidy the factory was required to show that not less than 75 percent of the plant and machinery was manufactured in Great Britain, but in case of factories erected before the passage of this act it was required that machinery installed after the passage of the act should be of British manufacture to the extent of at least 75 percent. The minister of agriculture and fisheries was authorized to make further exceptions as he saw fit. The rate of subsidy was as follows:

Article	Rate per hundredweight
	If manufactured between Sept. 30, 1924, and Oct. 1, 1928	If manufactured between Sept. 30, 1928, and Oct. 1, 1931	If manufactured between Sept. 30, 1931, and Oct. 1, 1934

The excise tax to the amount of 9 shillings 8⅔ pence the hundredweight was reimposed and no subsidy was to be paid until the excise was paid. Companies in receipt of subsidy were required to submit to the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries each year a statement in the form of a balance sheet containing a summary of the company's share capital, its liabilities and assets, and a statement of profit and loss. These company reports were to be laid before Parliament. Companies in receipt of subsidies were to guarantee fair wages to laborers employed in their factories.

A considerable discussion had arisen during the debate on this bill as to whether the subsidy should be paid for the manufacture of raw sugar or would be limited to the refining industry. The old refineries which imported colonial sugar wanted the new factories to limit their operations to the manufacture of raw sugar.

The law provided that where sugar or molasses was manufactured in one factory and removed to another factory for further manufacturing, if claim was not made for payment of subsidy in the first factory, the subsidy should be paid in respect of the article when finally manufactured in the second factory. Both the subsidy and the excise were made to apply retroactively to the crop of 1924.[11]

At the end of the first subsidy period, 1928, there was a considerable falling off in the acreage put to beet. The period of a guaranteed minimum price to growers had ended in 1927. The subsidy paid under the act of 1925 was actually less than the amount of the excise remitted in 1922–24. When the world price of sugar fell it was increasingly difficult for growers to make satisfactory contracts with the factories. The finance act of 1928 gave some assistance to refiners by reducing the rate of tariff on imported raw sugar. Many of the refineries at the end of the season in England imported raw sugar in order to increase their output.[12] In 1929 the Government appointed a commission to make a thorough study of the whole industry.

In view of the difficulties in the sugar industry, Mr. MacDonald on February 12, 1931, appealed to Parliament for further aid in the form of a loan to the sugar companies.[13] The Government came to an agreement with nine companies, named in the act, that a minimum price of 38 shillings a ton would be paid for beets, washed and topped and delivered to the factory. In return for this promise of a minimum price, the Government offered an advance to the companies on the first 300,000 hundredweight of sugar manufactured during the season 1931–32 to be computed on the basis of the market price as follows: If the market price of raw cane sugar of 96 degrees polarization exceeded 7 shillings and 9 pence no advance would be made. If the market price was less than 7 shillings and 9 pence, but not less than 6 shillings and 7 pence the advance made would be an amount equivalent to one seventy-eighth part of the subsidy payable under the act of 1925 multiplied by the number of pence by which the market price fell below 7 shillings and 9 pence. If the market price was less than 6 shillings and 7 pence, the advance to be made would be an amount equivalent to fifteen seventy-eighths parts of the subsidy payable under the act of 1925. No advances were to be made to any company for any sugar not manufactured from home-grown beets.

Until the total amount of the advances made to any company are repaid deductions from the subsidy due the company under the act of 1925 shall be made in respect of sugar manufactured during the period of 2 years beginning on the 1st day of October 1932 as follows: A basic price is determined for each company by adding to 7 shillings and 9 pence an amount equivalent to nine hundredths of the value of the buildings, plant, machinery, and other equipment, less depreciation, divided by such number as the minister of agriculture and fisheries may determine to be the number of hundredweight of sugar of 98 degrees polarization which the company could manufacture from home-grown beets during a period of 90 working days, if sufficient beets were available to keep the factories employed during that period. No deduction is made from the subsidy payable under the act of 1925 unless the market price of sugar exceeds this basic price for that company. But if the market price exceeds the basic price, one seventy-eighth part of the subsidy payable is deducted for every penny of the amount by which the one price exceeds the other.[14]

The act of 1931 came in for considerable criticism from members of Parliament. It was charged that sugar companies were paying high dividends and putting away enormous reserves at the expense of the taxpayers. Dr. Addison, minister of agriculture, stated that no company could make profits when the price of sugar was below 7 shillings 9 pence the hundredweight, and when it reached that price no advances would be made under the act of 1931. He had made agreements with companies for the advance only on condition that no profits were made and nothing put to reserves nor counted for depreciation. The sole purpose was to guarantee a minimum price to beet growers in order to insure the cultivation of the land.[15]

Factories which had not accepted the special advance offered by the Government contracted for 80,000 acres of beets, representing 44 percent less than their contracts in 1930, while companies that had accepted the Government advances contracted for 152,000 acres, a decline of 18 percent from their 1930 contracts.[16]

The chief difficulty in the operation of the act of 1931 was with the group of factories known as the Anglo-Dutch companies. They made contracts for beets at 35 shillings a ton plus four fifths of any profit that might remain. As a matter of fact, farmers did not grow beets and the factories lost money.[17]

The finance act of 1932 imposed an excise tax of 4 shillings 7 pence per hundredweight on sugar of a polarization exceeding 90°, 3 shillings 7.1 pence on sugar of a polarization from 98° to 99°, and other rates in proportion. The excise on molasses containing 70 or more percent of sweetening matter is 2 shillings 11 pence, on molasses containing from 50 to 70 percent sweetening matter, 2 shillings 1½ pence and on molasses not exceeding 50 percent sweetening matter 1 shilling ½ penny.[18] A comparison of these rates with the subsidy rates in the third period of the subsidy shows only a small margin in favor of the sugar industry.[19] The finance act of 1933 made no changes in the rates on sugar.[20]

On July 27, 1933, Major Elliot, Minister of Agriculture, announced that the Government had decided as a temporary measure to continue the subsidy on sugar and molasses manufactured from home-grown beets for 1 year after the expiration of the present subsidy on September 30, 1934. The rate on sugar will be continued at 6 shillings 6 pence per hundredweight as under the present law. There will be no subsidy on molasses so long as the world price of raw sugar exceeds 6 shillings per hundredweight. A subsidy at the rate of 1½ pence per hundredweight of sugar will be paid for each penny by which the price of sugar is less than 6 shillings until the present maximum subsidy on molasses is reached.[21]

Besides receiving a direct subsidy for sugar and molasses manufactured, the sugar companies received £2,215,000 under the trade facilities acts. This amount was not a grant but a loan, the principal and interest of which was guaranteed by the treasury.[22] Up to July 1931 the treasury had paid £541,980 in respect of principal and £3,266 in respect of interest on advances to beet-sugar companies. The treasury had written off £162,446 as irrecoverable.[23] Installments due to lenders under the trade facilities acts will run until 1938. Members of Parliament have insisted that these be paid off during the subsidy period, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that this cannot be done.[24]

Under the sugar act of 1931, £183,300 was advanced to those companies that came under the provisions of the act.[25] It is estimated that the continuation of the subsidy for 1 year, as now contemplated, will cost £3,000,000.[26]

In computing the cost of the subsidy, account must be taken of the loss of revenue which would have been collected on imported sugar, an item of considerable importance to the treasury. This revenue was not only lost, insofar as home-grown sugar was consumed in Great Britain, but the amount of colonial sugar imported under preferential tariffs has lately increased. Philip Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, estimated the loss at £1,709,000 in 1930 [27]; and Mr. Hore-Belisha, Financial Secretary of the Treasury, stated recently that the total cost of the subsidy and the revenue abatement from 1924 to 1933 was £37,440,000.[28]

Company reports as of March 31, 1933, show that the 15 companies in receipt of subsidies at that time had a total capital of £4,445,954, debentures amounting to £1,479,535, and accumulated reserves, including advances under the act of 1931, amounting to £1,375,073.[29] Dividends were high up to 1931. The average for all companies in 1932 was 4.4 percent. The Anglo-Dutch group, which has come in for considerable criticism, paid from 5 to 20 percent dividends, which are tax free. The English Beet Sugar Corporation, Ltd., the oldest company of this group, paid 12½ percent in 1925 and 1926, and 20 percent from 1927 to 1931.[30]

It is generally admitted that sugar beets could not be grown in England without the subsidy, though the wisdom of encouraging the production of beets is sometimes questioned. Land which is unsuited for beets has been cultivated under the subsidy. New and incompetent growers produce beets at a great cost, which could only be met by the subsidy. There is a tendency to neglect proper rotation of crops, and beets grown repeatedly on the same land are susceptible to disease.[31]

On the other hand, beet growing has many advantages. Some root crop must be grown in rotation with grain. Beets enrich the soil better than any method of subsoiling. The long roots aerate the soil, the crop leaves the land clean, and the tops left after the harvest furnish in some instances as much feed for sheep as a fodder crop would do. The beet grower has the advantage of delivering his crop at the factory without having it handled by middlemen. He gets his cash return immediately, without producing for an uncertain future market, as in cattle and sheep raising. The liquid waste of manufacturing sugar is a valuable fertilizer. Beet pulp purchased from the factories makes good feed for cattle. Much of the pulp in England is sold abroad instead of to the farmers. A member of Parliament, who is himself a beet grower, stated that by the time he had bought back the pulp for his cattle he found that he had made no profit on his sugar crop.[32]

Beet growing in England has never been as successful as on the Continent. The average yield per acre in England is 7 or 8 tons, while on the Continent it is from 9 to 13 tons. England, however, has the advantage of longer autumns free from frost, which permits lifting the crop later and insures a high sugar content.[33]

The beet subsidy has saved much land from going out of cultivation. In the 10 years, 1920–30, the land under cultivation decreased not less than 1,153,000 acres. In 1920, 3,045 acres were under beet; 10 years later 348,920 acres were sown to this crop. An investigation conducted by Cambridge University in the eastern counties of England in 1932 showed that the income from livestock had decreased 16 percent, while the income from crops had increased 6 percent, a fact which was attributed by the university to the growing of sugar beets.[34]

English beet growers have long charged the factories with taking the larger share of the subsidy. They are dissatisfied with contracts which are offered by the companies. In the present crop year the profit-sharing contract predominates. The growers are guaranteed 35 shillings to 37 shillings a ton for beets with a share in profits of the companies. The Cambridge University estimate of the cost of production is 35 shillings a ton, although some account must be taken of the fact that their estimate was made in 1929.[35]

The sugar-beet industry is favored in some quarters as an aid to employment. In four sugar-beet counties employment decreased 1.2 percent during the first 6 years of the subsidy, while the decrease in the rest of England was 12.3 percent in the same period. Factory workers employed the year round number 2,135; seasonal workers, 9,900. It is impossible to estimate the number employed on beet farms, but the intensive cultivation required is said to give employment to many agricultural laborers. Besides the industry uses a large quantity of coal and limestone and requires considerable transportation facilities. Employment in the factories is regarded as especially important because it comes at a season when employment is normally low.[36] There are others who regard the subsidy as an extravagant method of creating employment. It has been said that the subsidy costs more than a dole to all the workers employed in the industry.[37]

Considerable debate in Parliament and the press has arisen concerning the injustice of the subsidy on English-grown beets to the sugar industry in the British colonies, where sugar is the only source of private income and public revenue. The sugar colonies can produce sugar cheaper than the British beet growers, and they are dependent upon the English market to dispose of their crops. It is doubtful, however, whether the small quantity of sugar produced in England has injured the colonies. Under the preferential Empire tariffs the imports from the sugar colonies have greatly increased. Whatever criticism may have arisen on this account, the problem of the colonies has been presented as one of competition, not with English-grown sugar but with dumped Cuban and Czechoslovakian sugar. The difficulty of finding a market elsewhere has enhanced the importance of the English market to the colonies.[38]

There is considerable uneasiness in the sugar-beet industry at the present time because of the delay of the Government in announcing its future policy. It was the intention of Parliament that the subsidy should be a temporary measure. The three subsidy periods in the act of 1925, with a diminution of the subsidy in each period, were provided on the assumption that the industry would gain in strength. At the end of each subsidy period the industry has come back for further assistance. The temporary relief to the industry in 1931 has been extended. The subsidy period which should end in 1934 has also been extended for 1 year.

Mr. Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced in his budget speech, April 19, 1932, that a committee would be appointed to make a careful survey of the whole industry and to make a report before the expiration of the subsidy for the guidance of the Government in determining its policy. Parliament has shown considerable impatience with the delay in the appointment of the committee and the preparation of a report. Twice since the budget speech of Mr. Chamberlain the Government has come to Parliament for additional temporary aid. Permanent legislation cannot be introduced until the committee report is finished.[39]

In the meantime the growers, refiners, and factories have submitted an agreement which is under consideration of the Government, but which they have not seen fit to disclose. The present Minister of Agriculture is preparing an amendment of the agricultural marketing act of 1931 to include sugar. Any industry under that act is authorized to set up a board to regulate markets, fix prices, and, with the cooperation of the Board of Trade, to restrict importations of products likely to injure the operation of the scheme.[40]

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, from every section of Pennsylvania come requests to oppose House bill 8687 as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance. These requests are from labor as well as industrial leaders. We all agree that one of the most important problems before the American people today is that of foreign trade. However, we must keep in mind that the American market has a buying power equal to that of all of Europe, and, in light of that fact, we are called upon to determine how much of our market we wish to share with the rest of the world and upon what terms.

I have proposed an amendment to the pending bill providing that no agreement under its provisions shall be concluded with any foreign country with respect to articles in the production of which labor standards, as reflected in wages, living conditions, and labor costs are lower than those which obtain in the production of the comparable articles in the United States.

If we adopt this principle, the prize of our markets becomes an inducement to elevate the standards of living abroad, bringing them up to the level of our own. I am convinced that we can most effectively protect our own American market to the full extent it needs protection by using our purchasing power to enhance the value of our market to foreign countries for the purpose of elevating the standards of living in Europe and Asia instead of depressing them as we have often done.

When we put a tariff duty upon a foreign article the tendency is for the foreign producer to insist that the article must be produced more cheaply in order to meet our tariff, and he succeeds in depressing wages and lengthening the hours of the foreign workers in such a way as to shift the brunt of this burden to them. Thus, through this loss, he gains and maintains an active competition in American markets with goods made by sweated labor. Then the wages and conditions of labor abroad are used by the employers in this country—quite frequently the same men and the same corporations—as an argument for wage reductions and share-the-poverty programs here. I want a system of protection which actually protects the American worker and at the same time increases the world market for his product. Indeed, I want a system of protection which will give increased advantages to workers everywhere.

We desire our share of the markets of the world, but at the same time we should not fail to realize that the greatest buying power in the world is to be found within our own borders.

It is quite evident to all of us that if the foreign standards of living were as high as our own the foreign populations would absorb their own products for an indefinite period of time, and would also absorb some of ours.

Many plans are being launched today to increase our foreign trade, which is now, and has been, but a very small fraction of our total trade. All of us are more or less interested in our foreign trade. Complete isolation is impractical. We should do business with every country in the world that has something to sell without detriment to our own producers. In other words, that which we cannot produce we should buy from others, and others in turn should buy from us the things they cannot as satisfactorily produce as we can.

In these trying times many are urging us to lower our tariffs so that our foreign competitors may sell more of their competitive products to us, and thus it is urged they will be enabled to buy more of ours. Personally, I should want to make a close inspection of imports to ascertain the number of factories which we would be forced to close down if we gave a part of this business to foreign competitors. We have our own hands so tied by unemployment now that we can scarcely turn our attention to the problem of finding employment for the labor of the rest of the world. We certainly cannot find employment for them on any such basis as the American worker enjoys, and I am sure that we do not want to compel the American worker to compete with the low wages of the worker in foreign lands. We have recently set up codes of fair competition in American industries that we might end cutthroat competition, unfair practices, and reducing wages. How can we urge their practical application if we permit an all-paralyzing program of foreign cutthroat competition to invade our shores?

The declared purpose of the pending legislation is to expand foreign markets for the products of the United States. Under present circumstances this purpose cannot be achieved without admitting to our country imports in exchange for our exports through reciprocal trade agreements. It is proposed in the pending reciprocity bill that Congress shall give the President power to negotiate bargaining treaties.

If we are to follow the advice of the Secretary of Agriculture, we can readily see that the destinies of certain doomed industries will be placed in the hands of Presidential advisors who under this proposed act may bargain away and ruin the existing industry through competing imports from foreign countries. It may be argued that there is no such intention. However, in the case of the lace industry the intention of using it for bargaining purposes has been specifically mentioned by the spokesman of the Government. It must be presumed, therefore, that if the bill shall be passed in its present form and the President's advisers shall succeed with their program, the duties on lace will be reduced from 90 to 45 percent ad valorem. No greater reduction than 50 percent is permitted by the bill. Without doubt this would mean the prompt stoppage of all employment in the lace and kindred industries in our country.

The lace mills established here today represent a capital investment of at least $20,000,000 and give employment to 15,000 workers. The industry here would be disorganized and these thousands of people thrown upon relief rolls or put out on the street. It may be possible that the laces which at present are made in this country could be purchased from some European or Asiatic country, but we should not forget that their wages amount to less than 25 percent of those which our workers receive, and in the case of China they amount to practically nothing.

A great outcry has been raised about the falling off of our foreign trade. However, it should be remembered that since 1929 the total volume of goods exchanged between all important trading countries has been diminished 30 percent. According to the Statistical Abstract of the United States, during the year 1929 our total exports, excluding those to territories and possessions of the United States, amounted to over $5,000,000,000, while our imports amounted to considerably more than $4,000,000,000. By 1932 both our exports and imports had been reduced to considerably less than one half. Of course, considering the reduced volume of our foreign trade, it is necessary to take into consideration the fact that the whole world is now on a lower price level than it was in 1929. The decrease in actual tonnage, therefore, is not as great as I have indicated. It is likewise interesting to observe that the falling off of our imports has been in about the same proportion as between the free list and the dutiable list.

If it be contended that excessive rates in the present tariff act are responsible for the falling off in the volume of our foreign trade, I should like to ask why the administration has not done more to lower such rates under the flexible provision which now exists? Only four changes have been made in tariff rates during the past year. Two of these were changes downward and two upward.

From farmer and laborer come numberless requests to vote against the bill. This morning I received a telegram from the American Glass Workers' organization, which reads as follows:

> We, the glass blowers of Local Branch No. 15, Port Allegany, Pa., request you to oppose all tariff reciprocity legislation, as we feel assured, in the event of its passage, bottles will be made by men in foreign countries, and we will lose our jobs.

It was indicated yesterday on the floor of the Senate that the wool schedule will not be touched. Why disturb any other agricultural schedule? Indeed, I might ask, why disturb the industrial schedules? The glass workers are opposed to tinkering with the tariff, as indicated in their telegram, because in normal time, for normal consumption, we can make in 6 months all the glassware we need in a year. The window-glass workers can supply all our normal needs in 17 weeks. The pottery workers are opposed to the bill because in normal times they average 7 months' work a year. Shall we subject them to the low wages and working conditions of the pottery workers of Europe and Asia?

With our high excise taxes, coal is still being imported into this country, and our bituminous-coal workers are lucky if they get 6 months' work a year in normal times. The anthracite workers are most fortunate if they average 7 months. This also applies to workers in the oil, copper, and lumber industries. Our own normal needs give the steel worker an average of only about 7 months' work a year; and, again, I ask those who advise the President if they recommend that our industrial workers share a part of their reduced time of employment with their competitors abroad?

I am standing on safe ground when I say that on the basis of our present tariff our seaboard market has been practically lost to American workers. I am told that tin plate can be shipped from the land of my birth by water so as to undersell the plate made in the Pittsburgh district. Moreover, this is made possible only because of the wage differential.

I believe in nationalism—a nationalism which is broad enough to be ever mindful of the needs of other nations, but which at the same time puts first the needs of the American people. I believe with all my heart that if the amendment which I have offered shall be adopted, the living standards of foreign workers and their buying power will be increased. Thereby a home market for foreign products will be made possible such as we have developed within our own land. Thus the workers of all lands will develop a buying power which will enable them to consume the products of every machine now in existence, and keep them active on three 8-hour shifts for the next quarter of a century.

Tinkering with the tariff always unsettles business and creates uncertainty, even when these changes are made by Congress. Under the reciprocity bill under consideration these changes would be made by the advice of the President, although it would be impossible for him to give all these matters his personal consideration. Of necessity they would be referred by him to some agency under his direction. The danger, under these circumstances, is that the needs of our own people might then be subordinated to questions involving international political relationships.

The one great hope of American labor is increased business activity with an eye to attracting American consumers, who, while they continue to consume, produce enough to restore to our capital structure that which they have consumed. There are enough basic-commodity needs in the United States to keep our industrial machine fully active for many years to come if we could but once recover from the paralysis of panic and fear which has overwhelmed us. American labor must have good wages in order to build honest purchasing power. If wages can be maintained without being too largely lost through artificially inflated prices, our industrial machine will be set revolving once again and we can get busy at the long, hard task of paying off our debts. This we can do if we protect the working conditions, the wage levels, and the living standards of the American worker.

I agree with the eminent Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], Chairman of the Finance Committee, when he said yesterday that our problem today is not so much a question of overdevelopment of our agricultural and industrial machine as it is one of underconsumption. I repeat that which I have said many times: If the wages and working conditions and buying power of the workers in foreign lands were equal to the wages and buying power of the workers of the United States, they would enjoy, as we would enjoy, for an unlimited period of time the fruits of prosperity which crowned this land in 1926. To this end I have offered my amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate my argument against the pending proposal to clothe the President with unchecked and uncontrolled tariff-bargaining powers.

I do so with complete conviction that the proposal is wholly impractical and ill-advised, and calculated to be a grievous disappointment even to those who hopefully believe in it at the present hour.

But I also freely acknowledge that a contrary view is earnestly held by many men for whose judgment I have the greatest respect, and with whom I am exceedingly reluctant to disagree. Some of these men are business leaders in my own State. They include, for example, high spokesmen for the Michigan automotive industry. They include many of the leading newspaper analysts. They are entitled to have their approval of this bill recorded. They may be right. I may be wrong. None of us is entitled to be dogmatic upon this proposition. The needed encouragement of American export trade is an unsolved perplexity. But the very fact that this disagreement exists makes it the more necessary that I shall make clear what I believe to be the compelling and conclusive reasons why I find myself driven into opposition to the pending bill.

I shall not speak in political terms or implications. This is a problem in economics and government. It is more than a problem in trade; for none, I am sure, would bargain our birthright for a mess of pottage. It involves even the genius of our institutions, and it is from this viewpoint and this general statement of my objective that I seek to proceed.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this tariff-bargaining proposal for the following reasons, each of which I shall hope subsequently to develop and sustain:

First. The proposal demands a delegation of the congressional taxing power and the Senate's treaty-making power which is without color of constitutional warrant, and which finds no relevant precedent in any previous grant of Executive authority.

Furthermore, even if it shall be argued that the pending proposition falls within the letter of the Constitution, the argument submitted yesterday by the able and distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] demonstrates beyond any possibility of successful controversion that it falls utterly outside the boundaries of the spirit of the Constitution. This is another case where the letter killeth but the spirit giveth life.

Second. The proposal clothes the President with dictatorial authority to ruin industrial and agricultural commodities which may be chosen by him for sacrafice in pursuit of these bargains; to ruin these commodities and the American communities which may be dependent upon them for existence.

Third. This fate will overtake them without adequate warning and without adequate recourse, because the final hearings, which are grudingly allowed by one Senate amendment to the administration bill, are calculated to come too late in the bargaining process and to be too perfunctory to serve as real protection.

I might repeat parenthetically what I said yesterday in the colloquy of debate—that the net result of these hearings, in practical effect, is little more than to assure these death-marked industries a front seat at their own funeral. That is rather cold consolation.

Fourth. The President's decisions cease to be based upon the traditional American tariff yardstick; namely, the difference in cost of production at home and abroad; but reflect, instead, the presidential judgment that one American commodity should be sacrificed to the advantage of another, thus substituting executive judgment for established rule, and thus inviting entirely too free an opportunity for experimentation in the new philosophy that Washington bureaucrats are entitled to identify so-called "inefficient industries" and to put them out of business by their fiat.

Fifth. This means 3 years of uncertainty throughout the life of this amazing new power—3 years of uncertainty in which no protected trade in industry or agriculture may know and plan its own future with any continuity of assurance that it will not be the next victim of the next bargain. This could be an utterly fatal handicap to courageous long-range planning, so essential to recaptured prosperity.

Sixth. The proposal is not calculated to produce actual net advantage even for its chosen beneficiaries, because the "bargain" which trades new imports for new exports is likely, in the very nature of the case, to match every new sale abroad with an abandoned job at home. This does not cure our unemployment; it merely shifts it.

Seventh. The proposal tacitly ignores the primary and overwhelming importance of our own domestic market to our own domestic producers—the importance of maintaining our own domestic buying power. It emphasizes the importance of exports at the expense of the preservation of the home markets for home producers. The chances against the success of any such philosophy are as 13 to 1, because, in normal times our home sales are 13 times our export sales.

Eighth. The chances against profitable bargains—that is, profitable for us—are further accentuated by the fact that this bill, in terms, denies the use of the free list for bargaining purposes. This free list at this very moment represents more than $900,000,000 of foreign purchases which we made last year. This stupendous alien possession of our markets continues unabated and unrequited under this bill. We bargain only with future favors which we further extend to foreigners. We get nothing for the favors already enjoyed. But this, I confess, is no novelty. Uncle Sam usually plays Santa Claus to his neighbors and to his debtors.

Ninth. The proposal is squarely hostile to the administration's own theory and reliance in charting national recovery, namely, the N.R.A. and the A.A.A. These agencies deliberately plan increased costs of domestic production, thus increasing the spread between production costs at home and abroad. Each of these recovery laws contains within it specific authority to increase tariff protection, even to the point of complete embargo, thus specifically confessing the need for more rather than less domestic protection during this particular period when these tariff bargains are to trend in a diametrically opposite direction from the N.R.A. and the A.A.A.

Tenth. The proposal invites international complications of the precise type which we have been scrupulously avoiding for 140 years, because we cannot hope to open our markets to all of the foreign commodities for which entry will be eagerly sought, and as a result we may find ourselves accused of favoritism upon the one hand and further penalized with reprisals upon the other hand.

Eleventh. The proposal is opposed by much of the voice of organized industry, commerce, labor, and agriculture.

Mr. President, having set down this summary, I now desire to explore a few of these challenging fields in greater detail.

Of course, the most important thing, from a practical viewpoint, is to know precisely how these contemplated bargains are to work.

What American commodities are to enjoy increased export favors and which American commodities are to be stripped of their protection in whole or in part?

Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, one of the sponsors for this new movement, said at Cleveland on March 23 that out of 48,000,000 persons gainfully employed in the United States, 5,000,000 would be adversely affected by a tariff reduction. That is not my figure; it is the figure of the Secretary of Agriculture.

For the sake of the argument, let us use the Secretary's figure, although I think it would be much greater, because I believe it would involve the whole body of American agriculture. But take his figure. He identifies 5,000,000 American workers who could be adversely affected, and who, therefore, have a primary stake in this tariff thing we are considering.

Very well! Which of the 5,000,000 are to be sacrificed? What commodities are to be used as our bait in fishing for export advantages for other commodities?

No proponent of this bill dares to answer.

The distinguished Chairman of the Finance Committee, the able Senator from Mississippi, in his speech on yesterday declined to identify one single illustrative example. Why? Because, he said, it was too dangerous. The logical implication was irresistible; namely, that if we knew what was in store, the thing never would be allowed to happen. I beg to ask whether that is a sound reason why it should be allowed to happen?

Does the Senate discharge its obligation to the American people, at least 5,000,000 of whom, according to the Secretary's own mathematics, may be directly jeopardized by this thing proposed to be done, when it delivers them to a hazard which we are frankly told would never be tolerated if it were fully and fairly understood in advance?

If this is the necessary philosophy today, when we are framing the bill, the only philosophy which makes passage possible, will it not logically continue to be the philosophy tomorrow, if and when the bill goes into operation?

What, then, becomes of any reality of protection in these proposed hearings which the President will hold before he concludes one of these bargaining agreements? Will the hearings come in time to have any effective bearing on the possible rescue of a commodity marked for tariff slaughter? Or will it be a perfunctory hearing which keeps the word of promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope?

Can there be much doubt? If they admit they could never get this power except anonymously, do they not also admit that they could never hope to use it except in the absence of any public knowledge of specific intent? Does not this argue that these pretended hearings will be essentially post-mortem in character—a sort of review after the fact—a concession to the form of democracy but not to the substance?

Is this too violent an assumption when we remember that the original bill contemplated no hearings at all—contemplated nothing but a summary death warrant to the afflicted industry; when we remember that this provision in the pending measure is nothing but a Senate amendment which may easily expire ere the bill completes its legislative journey?

It was never intended by the authors of the bill that there should be hearings. It is the obvious truth that this whole bargaining process is necessarily a secret sort of operation wholly repugnant to the theory of our institutions.

So it is no wonder that we can get no information as to what would be considered a good or a typical bargain. Five million persons could be adversely affected by tariff reductions, says Secretary Wallace. There are probably mighty few tariff reductions of any sort which would not adversely affect some of them. Which are those likely to suffer? They say they do not know. That is probably true. But they also say they would not tell even if they did know. Otherwise they could not pass their bill.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. If 5,000,000 citizens of the United States are to be adversely affected, is it not the fact that those 5,000,000 citizens might be the total population of some 10 or 12 of our States?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; indeed. Or, stated differently, it represents a group of our citizens equal to the total population of the great State of Michigan.

Mr. CUTTING. In the case I indicated, these States might represent a quarter of the Membership of this body.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is entirely correct.

Mr. CUTTING. How could any Senator justify the ruin of the entire population of his State, or the possible ruin of the entire population of his State, even though there might be a greater number of people elsewhere benefited by the passage of a measure of this kind?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. He personifies the thing I am saying. It would be utterly impossible to procure the consent of the Senate to the net result which is possible under the use of this tariff bargaining power. As the Senator from New Mexico indicates, the representatives of the affected States would not dare go home in the face of consent to some of these things, if they were proposed directly rather than by indirection.

Furthermore, I use the example submitted by the Senator from New Mexico for this further purpose; after one of these bargains had decimated one of the States, as the Senator from New Mexico suggests, I submit that in that very process we would have withdrawn a section of American buying power from the total reservoir of American trade, which would fully offset any speculative advantage which might be contemplated from the new export sales of other commodities abroad.

Mr. President, as I was saying, those who sponsor the legislation say they do not know what bargains are in contemplation. I repeat, they also say that they would not dare tell even if they did know.

Is not that a strange legislative contemplation in a republic? I can understand how it would satisfy a dynasty. I can understand how snugly it would fit a Fascist pattern. I can understand why the following significant Associated Press dispatch from Rome was printed under date of March 29:

ITALIAN PRESS HAILS HOUSE TARIFF VICTORY

ROME, March 29.—Approval by the United States House of Representatives of a bill conferring tariff bargaining powers upon President Roosevelt was welcomed prominently here tonight in the Italian press.

Although the news arrived too late for official comment, the Fascist attitude toward the action was easily predictable—since fascism always has considered tariff commercial conventions a particular prerogative of the Chief Executive.

The Fascist attitude was easily predictable.

I repeat, Mr. President, that I can understand this Facist applause, but I cannot so easily identify justification for its American parallel and emulation.

The able Senator from Mississippi spoke yesterday of the so-called "reciprocity" sections of the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897, and pointed out that the Senate declined to ratify a single one of the so-called "Kasson Treaties" which were negotiated thereunder. He argued therefrom that the only way to get reciprocity agreements is to let the Executive ignore the Congress. That is only another way of saying that these Executive agreements invariably cannot stand congressional scrutiny; therefore, it is argued that the tariff-making authority ordained by the Constitution should be set aside, according to this new philosophy of action, so that agreements unsatisfactory to Congress and to the people it represents may be consummated. And they call this popular government.

No wonder they will give us no examples of the bargains they have in mind.

Just one tangible item seems thus far available. When the domestic wool market recently began to suffer seriously in price level because of the fear that one of the early Executive bargains would trade away our wool protection, there was hasty assurance from these prospective tariff autocrats that they have no present intention of attacking wool. It is not a firm warrant. But it will suffice to calm wool fears at least until the bill is passed.

But wool—and wool alone—thus far is the only commodity thus temporarily reprieved. Why should wool alone be immunized?

What of other farm commodities?

President Roosevelt delivered a notable campaign address at Baltimore on October 25, 1932. In it he particularly resented and rejected the notion that his administration, if elected, would lower farm tariffs. I quote:

Of course, it is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products. I promised to endeavor to restore the purchasing power of the farm dollar by making the tariff effective for agriculture and raising the price of farm products.

The President of the United States speaking:

I know of no excessive high-tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that any duties necessary to protect the farmer shall be lowered.

The President of the United States speaking:

To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived.

The President was right. He was equally forthright. I cannot believe that any farm tariffs are to be bargained away—although I confess I do not know what it is we are hoping to buy in increased imports from many of these foreign countries unless it be farm products. Many of them have nothing else to trade. Yet that would be absurd, says the President. But, once more, when we try to be specific, and when we suggest the direct exemption of farm tariffs from this new power, we are ominously told it cannot be.

So the eternal question recurs, What is it we are to give away to foreigners in order to get these fabulously increased exports? It must be something, and it must be something mighty substantial to justify the hope of all the good people who expect to get all these vast new foreign export orders in return.

The enthusiastic support, for example, which the great National Automobile Chamber of Commerce accords this bill is built up entirely upon its own undoubtedly earnest belief in and convenient acceptance of the theory that it will increase automobile exports by something like 250,000 cars per year.

But there is no suggestion in any of this literature or argument where or how these cars are to be sold. There is no discussion of what we are to give away in order to sell them.

Therefore there can be no consideration of that final, deadly question whether these manufacturers will not lose more sales at home because of the lost buying power of those Americans who lose their jobs when they lose their tariffs than can possibly be offset by new sales abroad. It is only the net that really counts.

No legislator could possibly be more interested than I am in greater sales of automobiles. I would sacrifice most other economic considerations to that end. But it does not suffice simply to claim this beneficent result in behalf of the pending formula. I warn that the net result might be an actual loss. First we must know the price to be paid for this bargain. We cannot know the price nor assess the net benefit of the bargain unless we know what the bargain is to be.

But we do not know, and I concede in the very nature of the use of this type of power that we cannot know.

Secretary Wallace has said, speaking at Athens, Ga., on May 12, that these bargains are to be made at the expense of "small, inefficiently conducted businesses." Perhaps that is a clue to the new tariff deal. Small, inefficiently conducted businesses are to be traded out of their existence. Instead of measuring the difference in cost of production at home and abroad by uniform and universal rule we are to submit American industry and agriculture and labor hereafter to the tyrannical decision of Washington commissars, who will decide for themselves by some theory of their own as to the inherent right of American business to live.

But this immediately brings us back to agriculture, which the President has said it would be absurd to disturb, because agriculture gives us one of our most concrete examples of what these administrators consider to be inefficient industry.

We had it on the word of the Secretary of Agriculture that the domestic sugar industry is inefficient. We had it on the word of the President in his message of February 8 that the domestic sugar industry is expensive. So, surely, here is one of those commercial operations which fits the Wallace formula as stated in Athens, Ga., on May 12, and which might be eligible for destruction.

I remind the Senate that this domestic sugar industry is consigned to the category of inefficiency and superlative expense, despite the fact that retail sugar sells in the United States cheaper than in any other spot on this globe, with four exceptions.

I submit to the Senate that any domestic industry struggling for its existence, as the sugar industry has struggled in the United States for the last decade, which can advantage the ultimate consumer to the extent of giving the maximum quality and minimum price against a world-wide comparison, is not an inefficient industry and is not an expensive industry, and is not an industry which deserves to be jeopardized with the possibility that some Washington bureaucrat may pass a death sentence upon it.

We are not just supposing that the sugar industry is threatened by this proposed bargaining power, Mr. President. We have it in a letter from the Chairman of the Tariff Commission written to the President on April 11, 1933, from which I quote the opening sentence:

> In view of the possibility of early action by our Government in regard to tariff bargaining, I venture to send you certain conclusions that have been reached by the Tariff Commission from our study of the sugar industry.

Does this mean that domestic sugar, already having suffered one tariff reduction under the use of the flexible power, is now to suffer another under the use of this bargaining power? The question goes unanswered. I would not unduly emphasize sugar. I simply use it as an illustrative example.

Or is it to be domestic lace, which some other spokesman of the administration inadvertently identified one day as an inefficient industry? Is it to be lace which we trade away?

Or is it to be the manufacture of period furniture, which Mr. George N. Peek, in an unguarded moment, partially identified as one of those in which we might make an international trade? Nobody answers. Those who know, if any do, decline to tell.

What is an inefficient or an inexpensive American industry which entitles it to be marked for free-trade slaughter by these new tariff commissars?

Is it any American industry which cannot produce as cheaply as the equivalent foreign industry, with its low alien wage scales and its low alien standards of living? On that basis, we should start toward the maximum of free trade, one of whose last remaining oracles is the distinguished and greatly beloved Secretary of State, who will be in a key place when the knives are whetted for this great contemplated operation.

On that basis, if that is the rule which is to be followed—and we are left to blind supposition on the subject—if that is the rule which distinguishes inefficiency, namely, that the commodity cannot be produced here as cheaply as abroad; if that is the rule, copper, for example, would be eligible for tariff reductions. But if the Senators from Arizona or Utah or Montana thought that copper rates would be traded away, they would never support the pending bill for a single moment. Do they know otherwise? How can they know otherwise? Oil would be eligible; chemicals would be eligible; fruits would be eligible; lumber would be eligible; shoes would be eligible; countless other American products would be eligible. Would Senators vote to curtail or kill domestic production in these and multiple kindred lines? They would not. Yet they will vote to permit it to be done by indirection; and if it were done, I assert it would be of no net advantage to America.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator does not want to be incorrect and does want to give the true interpretation of the proposal. He mentioned copper. Copper carries the excise tax, and the Senator will appreciate that the proposal freezes that and gives the President no jurisdiction to revise the rates either up or down.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that.

Mr. HARRISON. It gives him only the authority to continue them.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that, and I thank the Senator for his interruption.

Mr. HARRISON. When the Senator alludes to copper, I think that explanation ought to be made.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his interruption, because I see I might be misunderstood. The point is that the excise protection for copper, oil, and lumber is the temporary, expiring excise protection, which runs out next year. Sooner or later, if there is to be any permanent warrant of protected life for these important American commodities, it must be written into the tariff law. But I am submitting the fundamental proposition that if we have come to a point where only those industries in America which can produce more cheaply than similar industries abroad can produce are entitled to protection, there never will be protection for copper or oil or lumber or for most of the major commodities; and then, Mr. President, there soon will be no domestic market in which we can sell automobiles or anything else a little later. It is against the anonymous nature of the use of the power that I protest; it is the fact that we are not given one single illustration of the probable and possible use of this power of which I complain.

Ah, you say, the difficulty in handling specific rates is the trouble with congressional tariff making; you say it fails of national advantage because of local interests. That is absolutely true, to a degree. But speaking of the Nation, what is the whole except the sum of the parts; and which evil is the greater, the infirmity of congressional tariff making, plus administrative flexibility through a commission, or the infirmity of tariff making in America by Executive decree, with its inevitable subsequent political reprisals if any of these essential local interests are crucified? You do not escape the specific challenge; you merely postpone it.

But, Mr. President, I am not striving for controversy in this argument; I am trying to find some basis of illustration upon which we may fairly join the issue in contemplating whether or not there is practical value in the tariff-bargaining prospectus.

Let us take the first three of these indicated commodities, for the sake of the argument, since each one of those in some sort of degree has been at least partially identified for prospective-bargaining slaughter. I refer to domestic sugar, domestic lace, and period furniture. Taking these three as an example, and assuming that a bargain has been made, let us suppose that automobiles were the benefited reciprocal commodity. Very well. We sell more automobiles to Cuba, it may be, but we inevitably sell relatively less, and probably greatly less, in the 16 beet-sugar-producing States of our own home land. We sell more cars in France, perhaps, and relatively less in Rhode Island and Pennsylvania where the lace industry is decimated. We sell more cars in Belgium and England, in return for having bought our furniture over there, but we sell infinitely less cars in the furniture centers of Michigan and New York, Illinois, and North Carolina. Why is not that a cross-sectional picture of this thing which we are asked to do? Where is the net advantage? Is there not calculated, rather, to be a net loss?

With greatest respect for the export views of those who know more about automobile exports in a minute than I shall know in a year, I cannot see where this produces more net sales; and it is only in net sales—I emphasize the word "net"—that we can measure any final advantage.

It seems to me, at best, that the net sales balance sheet stands still. That is the most we can hope for; that the net balance sheet will stand still, while, at the same time, thousands of our own fellow citizens who are thus traded out of their jobs are added to the army of unemployed or to the farm deficit upon the countryside. Meanwhile I know of no assurance that automobiles are going to be chosen for these alleged favors. They might not be chosen at all. I should expect southern cotton to be much more likely to be nominated as the favorite.

These arguments lead to the inevitable conclusion that (1) either those who anticipate large American advantages from these tariff bargains are to be disappointed; or (2) that their aspirations can be validated only at deadly expense to others of their fellow citizens who thus are added to the sum total of the national depression.

Do these arguments also lead to the conclusion that nothing can be done to re-create foreign trade? Not at all. While our relative loss of world trade is slightly greater than the ratio of total world-trade recession, yet the basic fact is that our major loss of exports is the same loss suffered by others in a gigantic recession in world trade as a whole. Our prime menace in respect to export trade is a world depression. Our prime export hope is inherent world recovery.

I quote one significant sentence from the latest publication of the United States Automobile Chamber of Commerce, and I ask Senators particularly to attend to this quotation. Senators have a right to be earnestly interested in the recovery and recoupment of our export trade. Heaven knows, I am utterly concerned to that great end. The question is, How shall it best come? The question is, Can it be artificially stimulated? My proposition primarily is that, under the natural law of recurring world prosperity, in whatever degree it comes, we inevitably, without any of these doubtful bargains, are calculated again to be upon the forward march, and I call to the witness stand the United States Automobile Chamber of Commerce, from which I quote as follows:

> In the past year with more friendly foreign-trade policies not only here but abroad as well, mass buying power gradually became alive again and the volume of overseas sales of American motor vehicles rose to 240,000 and the increase during the first quarter of this year—> has exceeded by 100 percent the same period of the preceding year.

We are not standing still in respect to our export trade. We do not and shall not stand still in respect to exports when the world itself does not stand still. Here is the proof: A 100 percent export increase in a single quarter of the year in what is, perhaps, the most important of all our export commodities, and without a single bargain to speed the impulse. But I would not stop at this. I would further encourage export trade in every possible way and by every possible device short of domestic slaughter in other directions.

Meanwhile, Mr. President, our domestic prosperity is the major stake in all this thing, and one of my chief complaints against that which we are asked to do is that we lift our eyes away from the great blessing of our own home market and concentrate them almost exclusively beyond the seas.

Normal American prosperity is not dependent on an average of more than 10 percent of export trade. I believe the authenticated figure over the years is nearer 7 percent. That means, obviously, that our normal prosperity is 93 percent dependent upon our domestic markets. This utter predominance of the home market in relative importance is no excuse for abandoning all possible rational encouragement to enhanced foreign trade. But it is a 13-to-1 reason why any American economic prospectus should put at least 13 times as much emphasis upon the continued protection of home markets for home products as is put upon a quest for an export outlet. Further, it suggests a 13-to-1 chance that we shall lose more than we gain whenever we gamble the former against the latter. The lottery is pegged heavily against us.

If the President proves to be a shrewd trader, he may occasionally get the best of one of these tariff bargains. But experience warns us that we seldom outwit our international neighbors in an international deal.

If the President holds his own when he drives one of these bargains and the account stands even as between us and the alien, then we have merely traded an import for an export—one new domestic job for one abandoned domestic job—and the gain is zero. There is no advantage.

But if the President gets in any degree the worst of the bargain, then he has actually set us back instead of forward—and the mathematical chances, I repeat, are about 13 to 1 that this will be the unhappy result.

It is a gigantic speculation at best. Normal prosperity in the United States involves something like ninety billions of domestic consumption and five or six billions of export consumption. To risk the former in pursuit of the latter is sheer recklessness. It is worse than the folly of the dog in Aesop's fable who dropped a succulent bone into the pool while greedily reaching for its reflection.

To let one mortal man, no matter how able, take this risk at the possible expense of the whole American people would be amazingly wanton. It is bad enough that the Secretary of the Treasury should have $2,000,000,000 with which to play, at his own free will, with the money changers of the Old World. How much larger is the offense against caution and common sense if even so great a man as the President should have $90,000,000,000 with which to play at his own free will with the alien bargain hunters of the universe.

Here is another thing. We commission the President to this bargaining task under terrific handicap. He starts the race in hobbles. He cannot touch the free list. Our free imports last year were $906,000,000. Our dutiable imports were only $529,000,000. These contemplated bargains, under the terms of the bill, must leave this enormous free foreign invasion of our own markets practically alone. The President cannot transfer articles from the free list to the dutiable list. He cannot touch the alien free shipment to us of $20,000,000 worth of bananas, for example, $68,000,000 worth of newsprint, $13,000,000 worth of tea, $51,000,000 worth of tin, $124,000,000 worth of coffee, $33,000,000 worth of furs, $14,000,000 worth of grasses and fibers, $49,000,000 worth of rubber, $57,000,000 worth of wood pulp, and $102,000,000 worth of raw silk.

True, he could use a quota power against these imports if the foreign countries would agree to such restraints, but, of course, they will not agree to such restraints. Therefore, he is shorn of practical power to deal with this most important of all bargaining tools if there is to be bargaining at all. The only effective power which could be put into the hands of the President to make a tariff bargain to the shrewd advantage of the United States would be the power to let him agree in such a contract to leave articles upon the free list for a stated period.

Mark you, I do not advocate duties upon the raw products which I have mentioned. I do not advocate the extension of power of this bargaining process to the free list. I simply point out that the proposed bargaining powers are utterly ineffectual. They proceed on the untenable theory that foreigners are entitled to continue to enjoy all their existing free privileges in our markets, and that we in turn must pay, as Uncle Sam apparently always has to pay, for any advantages which we seek abroad. The free list runs on. In comes the Japanese silk, in comes the Brazilian coffee, in comes the Chinese tea, in comes the British tin. No charge is made against them for the invasion of our markets and our use of those commodities. No; the charges begin when we propose to reverse the process and seek a market for our goods over there.

I submit, and submit with all earnestness again, that if there were to be a bargaining power in connection with which there could be any hope of real American advantage without dire threat of subsequent loss, it would have to be a bargaining power in respect to the free list at least to the extent of permitting the President to make an international contract to leave a given commodity upon the free list for a stated time, in return for new American exports abroad.

Mr. President, we are constantly reminded by our economic philosophers that the world's trade—yea, and the world's peace—is beset by too many invidious barriers. We are told that there are too many handicaps to the free flow of goods; and that the new effort should be to level these restraints. Yet here is a proposed process which runs in the opposite direction, and with dire implications. We are told that the President needs these tariff-bargaining weapons in order to cope successfully with kindred maneuvers by other chancellories. So we proceed to arm him from the very arsenals which have set Europe by the ears. Having armed him, we launch him into the greatest international bluffing game on record. The effects may be far reaching beyond calculation.

Let us be frankly warned that foreign countries, each jealous of the other, will manipulate their own tariffs for the express purpose of forcing our hand. None of these foreign countries will sit idly by and let favor or advantage flow to another. They will scheme to force us into a disadvantageous position to the end that we shall pay their price for trade clemency. Machaivelli never confronted a more intriguing game. We put ourselves at the mercy of our alien competitors in a game at which they are past masters and we are but innocent and gullible amateurs.

Listen to a few words from the letter of the Chairman of the United States Tariff Commission to the Senate of the United States in response to Senate Resolution 325 of the Seventy-second Congress. I am now quoting the official records, Mr. President. The thing I have just said does not rest alone upon my ipse dixit for its authority. I quote from this official report to the Senate of the United States:

> Unless a reciprocity policy is handled with skill it may succeed in obtaining no concessions other than removal of those high rates, trade barriers, and discriminations which foreign countries have erected or maintained for the very purpose of bargaining them away.

Mr. President, I submit that that is an astounding warning to find imbedded in an official document to this body coming from the very sources which recommend the pending bargaining bill. Listen: We are warned that these foreign countries have deliberately maintained the policy of increasing their rates in order to have something to bargain away and yet remain without net disadvantage to themselves. And we think we can cope with such a game.

Here is something more on the same subject, quoting the same official source:

> Since 1919, there is evidence that the increasing of tariff rates and the erection of barriers, principally for use in bargaining, has grown rather than diminished. Accordingly, the difficulty of making a reciprocity policy yield net reductions in foreign tariffs has increased rather than diminished as the bargaining countries have attained—> greater experience.

What experience have we when we enter, like babes in the wood, upon this international market? Where is our experience as we deal with those who, we are warned upon official notice, have become past masters in the very art in which we gullibly think we might get the best of them?

Why ignore these implications? They tell us plainly that the Old World has put up its rates in order to bargain them down without net loss to itself. Are we so childish as to believe that the countries of the Old World will not do precisely the same thing with us? Are we equipped to play that game? No; we have not tilted our duties in order to have a gambling margin. No; we do not even propose to bargain with our free list. Is it sensible to think that we shall win in such a lottery?

I repeat that the Old World has been practicing this piracy for decades. They are old hands. We are kindergartners. We go as lambs to the slaughter.

I hope I am wrong; but, holding such views, there is nothing for me to do but to cling to our traditional tariff process, with all its admitted and unfortunate faults, rather than to fly to the embrace of ills we know not of. There is nothing for me to do but to stand by tariff protection, and not deliver its destinies to its traditional enemies. There is nothing for me to do but to pin my major American hopes upon domestic prosperity, and my export hopes upon our share of renewed trade in the world's reservoir as a whole. There is nothing for me to do but lean upon the already existing flexible machinery for some degree of more effective responsiveness to the fluxing need of the times.

One other thought, Mr. President: We are engaged today in a great nationalistic experiment. I refer to the N.R.A. It is frankly builded on a self-contained theory of economic nationalism which is the most pronounced and emphatic thing of its sort in the history of the modern world. It could not and cannot hope for success except as artificially stimulated pay scales and arbitrarily shortened work hours—all inevitably creating a higher American cost of commodity production—are protected by tariffs more effectually than ever before. The Republican theory of protection must be implicit in the N.R.A. program. Otherwise the N.R.A. program is suicide. This is an axiom. It is directly recognized by the National Industrial Recovery Act itself, which says, in section 3, that whenever the President finds an increasing ratio of imports of any competitive article which threatens to endanger the maintenance of any N.R.A. code, he shall, after investigation by the Tariff Commission—I quote:

> He shall direct that the article or articles concerned shall be permitted entry into the United States only upon such terms and conditions and subject to the payment of such fees and to such limitations in the total quantity which may be imported (in the course of any specified period or periods) as he shall find it necessary to prescribe in order that the entry thereof shall not render or tend to render ineffective any code or agreement made under this title. In order to enforce any limitations imposed on the total quantity of imports, in any specified period or periods, of any article or articles under this subsection, the President may forbid the importation of such article or articles unless the importer shall have first obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury a license pursuant to such regulations as the President may prescribe.

And he can even carry this increase to the point of complete embargo. He is given, indeed, specific embargo power.

I submit, Mr. President, that this is the exact opposite of the new proposal for tariff bargaining in pursuit of new export markets at the expense of increased imports.

Precisely the same thing is true with respect to processing taxes under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Every processing tax is matched by a correspondingly increased tariff against kindred imports. This is the philosophy, I repeat, of the highest tariff protection in the history of the United States; and it has to be if these artificial domestic tonics are to succeed. Lowered tariffs, by bargaining or otherwise, run in exactly the opposite direction.

We should be attempting the impossible task of going in two opposite directions simultaneously. It cannot be done. No human power, no matter how universally supported, can thus contravene the natural law. I paraphrase the able Secretary of Agriculture: "America must choose"—and our choice must be confined to one direction at a time. Not even our imperial galaxy of young professors, now occupying the campus of the Government, can escape this inexorable mandate.

If this proposed bargaining power sacrifices any tariffs on industrial commodities under the N.R.A., or on agricultural products under the A.A.A., it vetoes the new deal in both of these respects. It nullifies the recovery program.

If it ignores all coded commodities under the N.R.A., and all nurtured products under the A.A.A., then its field is so limited that the innovation cannot possibly be worth its cost in its wrench to our traditional institutions and in the sentence of uncertainty which it pronounces upon every American economic activity from the hour that this new power is lodged with the Executive.

No industry thereafter can make a long-range production plan. It will not know at what moment the news of a tariff bargain may announce its own death warrant. The very nature of the use of the new power is essentially secret. Any hearings are tantamount to drumhead court martial.

The President proposes; the President disposes. The deed is done. There is no truly effective appeal. The sword flashes. The economic corpse is cold. If it is a bad bargain—and the mathematical chances probably lean this way in overwhelming odds—if it is a bad bargain, it is just too bad. The tears are futile. The supreme authority has spoken.

It is no answer to say that the power will not be abused. I freely consent that no abuse would be premeditated, but it could none the less result. You are just as dead from an unpremeditated accident as you are from premeditated murder.

Confident economic planning, Mr. President, would simply become impossible in the presence of such a secret, summary power as is contemplated by this new tariff program. It is an invitation to renewed industrial timidity. It is a blight on long-range planning for the new prosperity. It violates every American theory of a day in court for those citizens who may deem their rights to be in jeopardy. It potentially nullifies the N.R.A. and the A.A.A. It is illogical, unwise, and unsafe from the very standpoint of those precise objectives to which the rest of the President's recovery program is dedicated.

The anomaly goes even further. In all human probability, the N.R.A. will put our production costs so high that we could not compete for foreign orders in most commodities even if we had the so-called "benefit" of one of these so-called "bargains." The foreign customer does not have to buy, even after his government has made the bargain. Indeed, he will decline to buy unless the price entices. The whole trend of the N.R.A. is calculated to make any such enticement impossible. Thus we confront the poor consolation of possessing only the shadow, rather than the substance, of any theoretical advantage which the bargain might bring us. We probably should lose even in those rare instances where, on the surface of things, we might seem superficially to have won. The whole arrangement is a nature fake.

Mr. President, the voice of organized agriculture in America speaks squarely out against this thing which the Senate is asked to do. It speaks through the National Grange. It speaks through the National Cooperative Council, a conference body of farmers' cooperative business organizations. It speaks through others who have a right to say that agriculture does not want its head upon this fatal chopping block.

Not only does organized agriculture speak against it; so equally do those spokesmen for organized labor who are best informed respecting this phase of their well-being.

American labor has infinitely more to lose from this tariff-bargaining prospectus than it has to gain. When the President says that exports cannot be increased without a corresponding increase in imports, he is saying that for every artificially created sale abroad there must be an abandoned job at home. American labor cannot possibly gain thereby. The obvious chances are that it will lose.

This leads Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, to say:

> As against all these urgencies for increased export trade, reciprocal trade treaties and other devices urged to that end, America's wage earners raise the more important issue of enlarging our domestic purchasing power and of increasing and protecting our home markets.

Hear him further:

> Regardless of how we balance advantages and disadvantages, the fact remains that the foreign market is not so desirable as the home market—either for capital or for labor. Goods exported must be sold at world prices in competition with goods produced by poorly paid, pauper, and even forced labor—and the certain result of large exports is always that labor of the chief exporting countries, such as England and Germany, is forced to accept lower wages in order to be able to compete effectively in the foreign market. In other words, the predominance of the foreign over the home market totally destroys the benefits of the protection of labor. What the Nation needs and is beginning to know it needs, is not great economic dependence upon the foreign market, but exactly the opposite—greater economic independence.

More—

> If it be the judgment that for practical efficiency Congress must no longer be trusted with joint treaty-making power in the matter of trade relations, why ought not sole authority be delegated to the President in dealing with agreements relating to international public debts, disarmament, and the like? Are we not thus hastening a time when power to be exercised by the President will be greater than the power of former kings, czars, and emperors?
> Labor has implicit confidence in the present incumbent of the Presidency of the United States and has implicit faith and confidence in his humanitarian instinct and in his desire to maintain and hold secure our democratic ideals, ideas, and institutions. We are confident he is actuated solely by a desire to get our people and our institutions out of the terrible chaos into which we had drifted. But labor is without knowledge of the certainties of life and who may succeed him or when. In addition, powers of government should not be granted because of faith in any one individual temporarily in authority. Power once delegated is difficult to limit, regulate, or annul. Are we not thus building a dangerous structure for the future, even if it be confined to reciprocal trade treaties? Who knows what the future has in store and to what end we are building a permanent structure on the basis of meeting an emergency by devices of expediency?

Mr. President, in addition to organized agriculture and organized labor, organized business, in most of its units, speaks out in a warning that we must stop, look, and listen before we proceed upon this way. I am speaking now primarily of the National Manufacturers Association, and of the recommendations of the United States Chamber of Commerce. This latter does not condemn the reciprocity theory; in fact, it is rather sympathetic with it, and in that aspect, under the existing circumstances, we totally disagree. But I point out that even these gentlemen cogently recommend:

> 1. That in granting authority to make tariff changes in the interest of reciprocal tariff negotiations the Congress write into the law the definite limitation that no rate be lowered to a point where American industry and agriculture shall be subjected to destructive foreign competition.
> 2. That the flexible provisions of the tariff act be maintained, embodying a basic controlling formula, laid down by Congress, according to which shall be determined the adequate protective level at which individual tariff rates shall be set.
> 3. That through a tariff adjustment board or other instrumentality, and in advance of such board making its recommendations to the President, there be full opportunity for American businesses likely to be affected by contemplated reciprocal tariff or other tariff changes to present testimony as to the incidence upon their respective enterprises of such changes.

These specifications cannot be said by any stretch of the imagination to fit the tariff bargaining bill upon which the Senate shortly will be asked to pass in spite of the new provision for some sort of incidental hearings after the fact.

Mr. President, I have talked entirely too long, infinitely longer than I had anticipated I would. I apologize to the Senate for this intrusion upon its good nature. My excuse is the intensity of my feeling that we are asked to embark either upon a futility or upon an error.

There are many other phases of this thing which I wish I could canvass. I should like to read Washington's Farewell Address, for example, with specific reference to his warning against entangling alliances, which may exist not only in the printed contract but exist equally through the display of extraordinary friendship toward one or more particular foreign countries.

Under the ultimate operation of this tariff-bargaining process, if it ever gets to working at all, we shall find ourselves classified by nations to whom we grant our favors as friendly, and we shall, as to nations whose requests we have to reject, find ourselves classified as hostile. This does not make for less friction in the world; it makes for more.

I wish I had the time to speak of favored-nation treaties. The fact of the matter is that every time we make one of these tariff bargains we will have to extend precisely the same favor to 28 other foreign countries in this world, and it is no answer to say that they have to give us in return the same advantage, because the thing we have traded to the particular foreign country may be a thing that foreign country alone can buy from us, whereas 28 other countries automatically, forthwith, must have the same privilege to send into our markets whatever it is the original country has traded in connection with this bargain. So here is another mathematical formula running against us, not a 13-to-1 chance that we lose, this time; now it is a 29-to-1 chance that we lose.

I wish I had time—and I do not intend to take the time—to review some of the superb arguments which were made not very long ago by eminent Democratic Senators across the aisle against a far more limited form of tariff flexion than is brought to us in this present amazing and astounding proposition. I do not refer to it through any thought of criticizing inconsistency. I realize that consistency is the vice of small minds, and I would not accuse any of my distinguished Democratic colleagues of possessing small minds. I refer to it only because out of the wealth of argument which they poured upon the land to demonstrate that the little, simple, existing flexible-tariff provision of the present law was an outrage upon the ark of the covenant—out of the wealth of those arguments I find tremendous solace as I confront the present challenge.

I favored, and still favor, the existing flexing power. I was glad to trust the President with it. I am perfectly willing and glad to trust the present President with it. I said so then. I repeat it now. But that flexing power was and is as nothing compared with the bargain power now asked. Yet my good Democratic colleagues, who bitterly attacked that simple formula, now swallow this new dose without a gulp.

Here I have the statement of the vigorous senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I can see him now as he used to speak at his desk yonder day in and day out during the last administration, and when he was confronted with the existing simple flexible tariff provision of the present law, he said:

> This is the break in the dike; we have been tinkering around this very weak spot for a long while, and now we are going to hit it, to open the crack, and destroy the legislative branch of our Government.

The Senator from Tennessee was right. We should have listened to the Senator from Tennessee at that time. It was the crack in the dike. Now the dike gives way. The difference, apparently, is that while the Senator from Tennessee objected to the crack in the dike, he has nothing to say when the dike itself goes out.

The distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the leader of the Democracy across the aisle, subscribed himself to a powerful challenge against the existing flexible tariff law, although it holds the President within stringent boundaries established by Congress itself. I quote but one section from the brief to which he gave his faith:

> Tariff making and revision under our Constitution are legislative duties, and to impose such responsibilities on the President as are carried in the flexible provision confuses legislative and Executive responsibility.

Mr. President, I did not think he was right 3 or 4 years ago when he was applying that stricture to the comparatively limited confusion of executive and legislative power at the time. Now we confront a situation in which not only are the legislative and executive functions to be confused, but we can take off the first three letters and say they are to be "fused" and the legislative authority under the Constitution is to disappear. I await the testimony of the able Senator from Arkansas upon it.

Here is a quotation from the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who is always earnest in his appeal to the conscience of the Senate and of the country. I quote the Senator as he inveighed against the comparatively limited use of a flexing tariff power a few years ago under Republican auspices:

> Under the Constitution the Senate, even though now Senators are elected by the people and are responsible to them, cannot originate a tax bill. It cannot originate a measure laying one dollar in taxes upon the American people. Yet we are seriously asked to delegate to the President a power which we do not ourselves possess.

That was a well-nigh unanswerable challenge then, although we evaded it; but if it was a challenge then, it is a challenge 10,000 times emphasized and multiplied in the presence of the existing complete proposed abdication of the Congress with respect to tariff-making power.

Here is a quotation from the able junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. The Senate always listens with the greatest respect when he explores and illuminates a subject. I quote his words urging us not to let the President tinker with a tariff rate even if an impartial and nonpartisan Tariff Commission had recommended that it be done after exhaustive hearing. He said:

> The new danger line in twentieth century government is drawn across the economic field. Are we going to hold that line or are we going to renounce the victory of a thousand years of fighting to break up the concentration of political power and permit the concentration of economic power in the custody of a single individual?
> No Member of this body who has regard for the judgment of posterity can fail to make a correct decision or afford to make a wrong one.

Mr. President, if we were contemplating at that time one tenth as great a concentration of economic power as is being concentrated now, then I am indeed a tyro in arithmetic. I am not afraid of the alleged concentration as it was hedged about by metes and bounds in the existing flexible tariff law. But, Mr. President, I cannot understand for the life of me how Senators who declined to get the consent of their consciences to that limited use of Executive authority with respect to tariffs, can now consent to the complete abdication of the tariff power on the part of the Congress and in the direction of the President. I do not refer, of course, to the President personally. What I say would apply to any President, be he Republican or Democrat or otherwise.

Mr. President, here is another very eloquent quotation. I am now using the words of the earnest, crusading senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who always puts his whole heart and soul into the convictions which he pours out upon this floor. I quote him, begging us quite recently not to give the President the first nickel's worth of tariff flexing power:

> The proposal confronting us clothes the President with legislative power.
> It merges the Capitol in the White House.
> It deposits the dead body of a suicide Congress at the feet of Herbert Hoover.
> What a melancholy spectacle it would afford—the remains of a once courageous and coequal branch of government which yesterday might have stood against the world.
> Assuredly there would be none so poor to do it reverence.
> Not even pity would be its due—only the measureless contempt of mankind.
> The measure under consideration enables the President to make law—to legislate.
> It destroys, so far as its operation is concerned, one of the most vital features of our system of free government—the separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial functions.
> It is a part of that process of concentration in government and industry which is the most appalling mark of the time, a process which is banishing freedom and opportunity from American life.
> It makes the cynic laugh, the patriot grieve.

Mr. President, if the cynic could laugh and the patriot grieve just because we let a President of the United States use an utterly limited flexing power within metes and bounds written by our own votes and after an investigation by a tariff commission which must establish the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, then I do not know what the cynic will do, or where the patriot will go to find an adequate wailing wall in the face of the present contemplation in which we are asked to sweep all congressional prerogative into the basket of the White House.

Mr. President, this is very interesting reading. I am not going to continue it. I have scores of quotations here representing practically the entire Democratic Membership across the aisle as it sat here and fought bitterly under the sturdy steel of the leadership of the eminent Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] against any use of a flexing power in the hands of an Executive of the United States.

"Times have changed", they say. That is right. "New times require new answers." That is right. I am not afraid of innovations. I have demonstrated that by more votes than one upon this floor in sympathy with this so-called "new deal." But when you start to innovate with respect to the Constitution of the United States, and by indirection, and when you know by the confession of your own words a few years previous that this is precisely the thing you do, then I do protest. And when you propose to deliver the economic life blood of labor and industry and agriculture and commerce into the sole dictatorial, autocratic possession of one President of the United States, I care not who he be, I protest that bureaucracy has gone too far to leave freedom breathing safely in our United States.

I conclude with the words of another great Democratic leader, the late President Wilson, speaking on January 8, 1918:

> The history of liberty is a history of the limitation of governmental power, not the increase of it. When we resist, therefore, the concentration of power we are resisting the processes of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties.

Mr. President, I do not believe this bill should pass.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Kean	Reynolds
Ashurst	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Davis	King	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Dickinson	Logan	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	Lonergan	Schall
Bankhead	Dill	Long	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	McCarran	Smith
Black	Erickson	McGill	Steiwer
Bone	Fess	McKellar	Stephens
Borah	Fletcher	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	Frazier	Metcalf	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	George	Murphy	Thompson
Bulow	Gibson	Neely	Townsend
Byrd	Glass	Norbeck	Tydings
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Norris	Vandenberg
Carey	Hale	Nye	Van Nuys
Clark	Harrison	O'Mahoney	Wagner
Connally	Hastings	Overton	Walcott
Coolidge	Hatch	Patterson	Walsh
Copeland	Hayden	Pittman	Wheeler
Costigan	Johnson	Pope	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, when this Congress shall adjourn it will have made history. Never before have the Representatives of a democracy been forced to place their official sanction upon such strange and dangerous economic experiments as we have received from the "brain trusters" of this administration. Bills of tremendous import have been brought before us and voted into law almost before the ink has dried on the pens of those who wrote them. In rapid succession we have entered into experiment after experiment, until now we are to consider the gravest of all. We are asked to pass legislation which will, in effect, abandon the theory of protection in favor of a system of reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries. This legislation is advocated on the ground that it is a part of an emergency recovery program, and that since we are in the throes of an economic panic we should adopt drastic and revolutionary measures with which to combat the evil which has befallen world commerce. The successive steps which have led up to this final economic experiment have included the creation of numerous bureaus, designated by alphabetical symbols, with authority to regulate the productive power of individuals engaged in agriculture and industry. The foundation upon which this theory rests is composed of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the National Industrial Recovery Act. The first seeks to limit the productive power of the individual engaged in agriculture, while the second would reduce the productive power of those engaged in industry. The protective tariff, however, is of tremendous value to both industry and agriculture, and in any discussion of it we cannot ignore one in favor of the other.

Since the inception of the principle of a protective tariff the basic argument for its existence has been that high living standards in the United States cannot be maintained if domestic commodities are placed in direct competition with those produced abroad. The perennial answer to that argument has been that while the American worker receives a higher wage he at the same time produces more goods.

As late as a year ago numerous champions of a low tariff have expounded the theory that the differential between the American wage earner and the foreign wage earner is not as great as the relative productive power. It must follow that the philosophy of the whole new deal has been one designed to eliminate the main argument held out against protection. Through the Industrial Recovery Act we have limited the working hours of industry and maintained the wage scales. In effect, we have tremendously reduced the average productive power of the individual who shares in the fruits of industry. There may be some truth in the argument that wages should not be used as the sole basis for constructing a system of protection against foreign competition. There may be truth in the theory that domestic wages and productive power should both be analyzed in relation to those of foreign industries. Today, however, the industries of the United States have been subjected to regulation through our code authorities to a point where the commodities produced by the individual worker are less in many cases than those of our foreign competitors. It would seem, therefore, that the whole philosophy of the N.R.A. is in itself the answer to the main argument against the protective tariff.

It is true that world commerce has been greatly reduced during this depression, but international trade has declined in no greater proportion than the actual decline in consumption of commodities within the countries of the world. The trouble is not so much in the interchange of products between countries as it is the existence of economic maladjustments within the countries themselves. Just how we can expect to increase the purchase and use of commodities in the United States by trading off our industries to foreign countries is more than I can understand.

When we are forced to close down our lace mills in order that France and Belgium may sell lace in the United States, what are we going to do with the 20,000 families who gain their livelihood from the manufacture of lace? Under the plan of this bill these workers would be absorbed elsewhere, theoretically, in the manufacture of products for export to France and Belgium; but actually, I presume, we shall have to set up another alphabetical relief bureau in order to extend charity to those persons made destitute by our economic theorists. Every country of the world is faced with economic troubles. Each country, likewise, is seeking to rejuvenate its international trade. Domestic commerce in every country is dependent upon conditions peculiar to that country, and domestic conditions are something which no amount of international trade regulation can correct. To whatever drastic limits we might extend our system of codes and alphabets, they cannot reach into the mills of France and China and institute conditions which will compare with the factories of the United States.

If our ports are to be opened to foreign products, we must open our industrial system to foreign hours and wages. Competition is the very life of trade; and while it may be stifled for a short time by domestic laws and regulations, it can never be removed from its place at the very core of world commerce. Regardless of how many millions of dollars we might pay for the products of nations of low standards of living, we can only sell an amount of commodities which the same number of dollars would produce in this country. If this holds true—and it is certainly good logic—the experimentation which will follow the passage of the tariff bill will retard recovery in this country for many years to come.

When the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was passed in 1930, the opposition argued over and over again that Americans could compete with foreign countries because they produce more commodities per capita. At that time American workers were paid about four times as much wage as the Belgians, while producing twice as much. Today, however, our workers must operate under a complicated system of codes and trade practices which have greatly depreciated the producing power while at the same time increased wage payments. How, then, can we expect to receive economic benefits from lower tariffs?

What will be the effect of this bill? It is primarily a bill designed to generally reduce the tariff. It gives the President power to enter into trade agreements with foreign countries. He will be clothed with the authority to enforce and encourage these agreements through the taxing power and through power to remove trade restrictions and import barriers. He will be able to reduce or increase tariff duties by 50 percent. He will be authorized to remove all restrictions on importations from abroad. He will have power to remove excise taxes and processing taxes which have been imposed for the purpose of regulating importations. The basic purpose of this bill is to encourage the importation into the United States of some commodities in order that we might sell others abroad. It is intended to destroy the so-called "inefficient" industries, with the idea that the workers in those industries may be more profitably engaged in others. The proponents of the bill insist it is a temporary measure, but it has all the aspects of a broad and general policy. I have just received from the office of a Democratic Senator a pamphlet which analyzes this tariff bill from the standpoint of its authors. In this pamphlet it is declared that the program to wipe out certain industries in this country will cover a full generation. I quote:

> The problem is one for far-seeing and dispassionate economic planning, with a continuity of purpose which overrides political changes and the hysteria of the moment, and overrules the pressure of special interests. The development of such a plan will be the work of a full generation; but it is none too soon for the beginning to be made, however imperfect such beginning may be.

If this bill is only a beginning, I hesitate to imagine what the concluding acts of those responsible for this program will be. In the same pamphlet which I have just quoted the tariff bill is defended on the ground that a relatively small number of industries will be completely destroyed, and that the number of workers in those industries is relatively small. It is claimed that the railroads, public utilities, service occupations, and professions will not be affected. I quote:

> And, in the final summing up, the major changes would affect a limited number of those manufacturing operations in which the processes of mechanization have less than ordinary applicability, and the products of which involve minor transportation charges. Certain classes of textiles, crockery, and articles of skilled or artistic handicraft would be typical of the production most directly involved. In addition, there might be minor shifts in agriculture and elsewhere. Certain farmers now raising flax and hard wheat might shift to the raising of soft wheat and other exportable foodstuffs, and other minor shifts might take place even within the highly mechanized industries. But none of such shifts could affect any relatively large groups of workers.

Further, it is declared that in these specific industries slated for execution only 400,000 workers will lose their jobs. Only a million and a half people will have to find new sources for a livelihood. This is typical of the ballyhoo which the academics have been parading before the Congress during the past 18 months.

Another phase of the ballyhoo we have heard recently has been the poppycock about stabilized production. Any man who has had experience in a business enterprise knows that he cannot consistently operate his business under a systematized plan unless he can have complete confidence in the stability of all industrial fields into which his business reaches. One of the notes which I heard reiterated over and over again during the hearings on the tariff bill was that Presidential tariff-making could only result in a complete lack of confidence on the part of the producers of raw commodities and the processors of them. I heard the growers of wool lament the fact that the market price of their product had already dropped because of the possibility that this tariff bill would be enacted into law.

I heard the buyers of wool assert that they were afraid to invest in stocks of this commodity because they could not know when their investments would be jeopardized by an overnight revision of the tariff by theorists who probably have never seen a shearing. I heard one of the outstanding Democrats of New England, a prominent manufacturer of lace, characterize this bill as one which would be conducive to industry instability and which would destroy the jobs of workers. Argument after argument and fact after fact were presented to the committee with startling futility. We are concocting dangerous remedies for industrial ills without regard to the deleterious effects which these remedies may have upon our whole social and economic system. It cannot be long before thinking people become alarmed at our carelessly constructed laws.

As a practical matter the course of good logic should prove that we cannot limit the productive power of industry with burdensome code and trade practices, load the people down with excessive taxes, pour billions of dollars into relief experiments, and at the same time force the industries which naturally must bear this tremendous weight to compete in their own market with industries of countries which are free from codes and alphabets.

These are but a few of the many reasons why this bill should not be passed.

Mr. President, in looking over some of the speeches which have been made on this subject in the past, I came across one which would seem to be of special interest under existing circumstances. I want to read the words of the present Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, uttered on May 19, 1932. This is what he said at that time:

> I am unalterably opposed to section 315 of the Tariff Act and demand its speedy repeal. I strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party, which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision, with such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution—a vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic King.
> The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible-tariff clause are astonishing, are undoubtedly unconstitutional, and are violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion, "this is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

I now desire to quote from a great friend of mine, a man for whom I have the greatest respect—the Vice President of the United States, Hon. John N. Garner.

On May 9, 1929 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1080), when he was a Member of the House, our distinguished Vice President said:

> Sections 315, 316, and 317 are known as the flexible provisions of the tariff. No man has ever defended this as a proper policy of the Government.
> Remember this gentlemen: When the legislative body surrenders its tariff power and its obligations to the Executive—under our system of government a majority can do that, but you can never recover them except by a two-thirds vote of the House and the Senate.
> Remember that when you surrender this power of taxation you surrender it for all time to come or until the two bodies, by a two-thirds vote, can take it away from the Executive.

Again, on June 6, 1929 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2460), he said:

> * * * I do not consider the rates the most vicious feature of the bill. The proposal of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, contained in the administrative provisions of this measure, to surrender to the executive branch of the Government the power of taxation which, by the Constitution is reposed in the legislative branch, is unthinkable. With these administrative features retained I could not support this bill even if it carried every rate that I would write.

WILLIAM J. O'BRIAN

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOLIDGE in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate William J. O'Brian, of Buffalo, N.Y., to be collector of customs for customs collection district no. 9, with headquarters at Buffalo, N.Y., in place of Fred A. Bradley.

This nomination is to correct an error in spelling of surname as previously submitted on February 26, 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 18, 1934.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, about a month ago the Senate confirmed William J. O'Brian to be collector of customs at Buffalo, N.Y. As the commission came from the President the name was spelled in the classical way "O'Brien." It seems the name is "O'Brian." The President has just sent a new nomination to the Senate with the proper spelling. As in executive session, I ask that the nomination of William J. O'Brian, to be collector of customs at Buffalo, N.Y., be confirmed and that the President be notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed and, without objection, the President will be notified.

RECIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, of the many questions that come before Congress or that have come before it during the past 140 years, there is no one that has been so constantly before us as the tariff question. I think it may be stated to be the rule of history, if there is such a thing, that issues come up and are disposed of, problems are presented and solutions agreed upon, and the issue passes and does not recur. Not so with the subject we are discussing today. In some form or other it has been constantly before the American people, and during all the period of our national existence it has come before them in great national contests in order to be determined one way or the other.

I need not repeat what is so well known, because so often stated, that the first law signed by General Washington as President was a tariff law. Nor need I state that it is the one question on which parties have taken different views at various times as on probably no other question which has been before us.

We all listened with interest to the historic discussion of the Senator from Arizona, [Mr. ASHURST] some days ago, when he reminded us how the protective idea was supported by such men as Washington, Madison, and in a form by Jefferson, though not so distinctly as in the case of the other two, and even by General Jackson, to say nothing about more recent leaders.

One of the anomalies in the discussion of this question is that the author of the tariff measure of 1817 was none other than John C. Calhoun; and all who are familiar with the history of this issue will recall that later he became the most defiant opponent of it in our history, even denominating the act of 1828 "the bill of abominations."

It will also be recalled that the brilliant statesman from South Carolina, whom I regard as one of the most original, as well as one of the most daring, thinkers the politics of our country has yet produced, was opposed by none other than Daniel Webster. At that particular time the issue was being discussed on sectional grounds. Webster, representing the New England idea, had a conviction that tariff for protection carried with it an unconstitutional feature. Calhoun was not disturbed by that argument.

Seven years later the two men began to change places. In the discussion of 1824 Calhoun was rapidly drifting to opposition to the policy of protection, while Webster with equal pace was drifting away from his prior position of greater freedom of trade; and by 1828 Webster, who had been an opponent of the policy of protection in 1817, became a strong advocate of it, while, as I stated, Calhoun denominated it "the bill of abominations."

It is enough to say that the issue at that time was fought out largely on constitutional grounds. One theory was that the power to raise revenue, bills for which purpose were specifically required by the Constitution to originate in the House of Representatives, was limited solely to revenue raising; while the other theory was that if the duty were imposed in such a way and on such articles as to stimulate American production, it would be constitutional under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution.

From a study of the evolution of the discussion on this general issue, it will be observed that that line of demarcation ran all through our history. Up to this time the entire membership of no political party has with unity supported the one idea or the other. I may state that the different views have been advocated by leaders rather than by parties. The time to which I have been referring was before the day of national conventions and the adoption of platforms.

Previous to that time, speaking of 1828, all candidates were selected by the caucus system. The old caucus system was not the same as what we today call the caucus system. A candidate for President would be selected by groups found in the Senate and in the House of Representatives here in Washington. The caucus selecting candidates up to that time, therefore, was a sort of closed caucus.

Mr. President, before the national convention idea, and especially before the policy of adopting platforms was inaugurated, the method of selecting candidates was confined to the old caucus system, which became very objectionable and had to be abandoned.

After we entered upon the policy of announcing the position of a political party through a platform, we approached the practice of committing the members of a party, as a party, to the pledges made in its convention. Following that, it was comparatively easy to make a question a party issue, and go to the country upon the issue of whether this or that policy should be adopted or rejected.

It was never possible to get all the members of any political party to agree on the question of the tariff. There always was a very respectable element in the Democratic Party, after it had taken a position for tariff for revenue only, which would not go along with that view, and even within the Whig Party, which stood for a protective tariff, there was always a more or less brilliant minority which would not go along. Not until the time of the Civil War did the tariff question become such an issue that it really could be said that one party affirmed it and the other one rejected it.

Very largely this difference of opinion was local. So long as the issue was purely a local issue, no political party could be committed to it; but even after the platform plan was adopted, many in the Whig Party would not go along with those espousing the protective-tariff view, which was conceived by Henry Clay, who was known as the "father of the American system", meaning the protective tariff, and equally was it true that there were leading individuals in the other party who would not go along with tariff-for-revenue-only view. So it might be said that always in the Democratic Party there were protectionists, as in the Whig Party and later in the Republican Party there were those who were for tariff for revenue only.

In connnection with this question the mutations are very notable. For example, when it became a party issue, the party founded by Jefferson took the constitutional view that customs duties must be limited to the purpose of raising revenue; that any other position would be unconstitutional; while those who were the followers of the Hamiltonian theory took the position that if it were for the general welfare or would induce a better national defense, it would be constitutional to lay a tariff not for revenue but to protect the industries at home.

Anyone who is interested in following the discussion in connection with this particular line of dispute will find great authority on either side. I think now it has come to be generally conceded that the protective idea, which is not merely to raise revenue, but which is to stimulate American production while at the same time raising revenue, is constitutional, and now we do not hear that question very seriously discussed.

After the Civil War the tariff question made a very distinct line of cleavage between the two parties. Our Democratic brethren held to the tariff-for-revenue-only theory. There were exceptions, notably one very brilliant exception, to the solidarity of the party in its stand for tariff for revenue only. I refer to the famous Samuel J. Randall, a distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives. Just how far his view on protection, he being a very distinguished Democrat, is explained by his coming from Pennsylvania, I am not able to state, but I assume that fact had something to do with it. And just how far John G. Carlisle, the very distinguished Democratic leader who was convinced that the theory of Randall was unconstitutional as well as uneconomic, may have had his views colored largely by the atmosphere in which he lived, I do not assume to say.

We had first the free-trade idea. Ultimately that idea had to be abandoned by every party which advanced it. It was not abandoned by all leaders, but it was not endorsed by any considerable number to that point of nicety of omitting all obstructions in the form of tariff duties.

Then we had tariff for revenue with incidental protection. That theory was announced by Samuel J. Randall.

Then later on we had what is called the "competitive tariff." That is a recent nomenclature. I think the first brilliant Democratic leader who announced that theory was our much-beloved, late-lamented Oscar Underwood, and the bill which bears his name was not, in his judgment, a tariff-for-revenue-only measure. It was not written as a measure providing a tariff with incidental protection, but it was written as a competitive tariff under which Europe was given an opportunity to compete with us, and we with Europe.

Personally I cannot see any difference in policy between a competitive tariff and a tariff for revenue only. In other words, it is not a protective tariff, and, therefore, I could not give my approval to the principle of a competitive tariff any quicker than I could to a tariff for revenue only, and not as quickly as I could to a tariff for revenue with incidental protection.

I mention this, Mr. President, to indicate the mutations of this question from year to year as we were trying to reach a decision as to the correct policy we should follow. But I think I am within the realm of accuracy when I say that the protective theory has always had a tremendous hold upon the majority of our people. We have had it in some form or other from the very days of the beginning of the Government, and, being placed purely upon the basis of employing labor and maintaining our wage scale—in other words, our standard of living—it has been rather a popular theory when the people of the United States have been appealed to on that particular issue. The few periods during which we have had legislation dealing with what we may call greater freedom of trade, or whatever it may be called, under a tariff for revenue, or tariff for revenue with incidental protection, or a competitive tariff, have been very brief, and not only that but have been followed by unfortunate circumstances.

I am within the realm of truth when I say that every occasion when we have abandoned the policy of the protection of American industry on behalf of labor has been followed by a serious depression. If I should now enumerate the crises, the economic disturbances that mark our history, it would be apparent that in nearly every case the crisis or disturbance was introduced, or at least was coincident with a change from the protective to the revenue system of tariff, and relief has always been afforded by a change back to the protective system.

Our Democratic friends say that is merely coincidental, that it is not cause and effect. I differ from that judgment.

If we take the crisis of 1817 and follow it through we find that what I state is true, that a crisis follows an effort to abandon the protective policy, and the crisis is relieved by the resumption of the protective policy. That was also true in 1837.

"The bill of abominations", so denominated by John C. Calhoun in 1828, created such a bitterness between two sections of the country that Henry Clay employed his powers as a pacificator to compromise the issue. That is one reason why he is called the "Great Compromiser." This was one of the first of his great compromises. It is hardly true to say that it was the first, because the first one was in connection with the Missouri Compromise, the authorship of which, by the way, does not go to Clay but to a Jesse B. Thomas, of Illinois. But in view of the fact that Clay was the most powerful figure, and ultimately carried out the compromise in the dispute on the admission of Missouri, it is credited to him.

In 1833, 5 years after the bitterness created by the tariff bill of 1828, Henry Clay offered the compromise to establish a certain decreasing rate of duties so that within 10 years the general average of duties would be lowered to a certain level. The mere introduction of that bill disturbed business and had a direful effect upon the industries of the country, although the very father of the American system was sponsoring the legislation. Following the crisis of 1837, the only way out was by the abandonment of that compromise.

Then, in 1846, what our Democratic brethren call the greatest tariff bill, from a Democratic standpoint, in our history was enacted. It was known as the "Walker Tariff Act" of that year.

Following the Tariff Act of 1846, which was a tariff-for-revenue-only act, there was a very great stimulus of business. Democratic historians always point to that fact as evidence that tariff legislation of that character—that is, tariff legislation framed in accordance with the Democratic view—is the promoter of great activity in business, because such activity did follow the enactment of the Tariff Act of 1846.

Mr. President, anyone who will examine the history of that period will find great significance in the events which immediately followed the enactment of the act of 1846. At that time there was a devastating famine in China, so that everything we could produce in the way of foods found there a market, and, especially, that was the period of the Crimean War when three of the greatest producing countries of Europe were involved in a 3-year conflict, thus affording a market in the Near East, which created a demand such as we never before had and which eagerly absorbed everything we could produce. Anyone considering those facts will find an ample explanation of the great export trade that followed the enactment of the Walker tariff in 1846. Instead of that great export trade following as a result of the enactment of the Walker tariff law, in my judgment, that measure had nothing whatever to do with it, but the stimulus was wholly due to the great demand for American products created by those two situations which had arisen in the East and in the Near East. It was the result of famine and war. That, however, has been entirely overlooked, and so, mistakenly, the Walker Tariff Act is cited as one of the outstanding examples for the claim of our Democratic friends that the enactment of their principles of tariff assures prosperity.

What I have said is reenforced tremendously by the conditions which existed during the entire period from the Civil War up to 1929. I do not need to rehearse those conditions because they are matters of commonplace information which are known to us all.

There is another thing that is of interest to us in this discussion, and that is that while the Federalist, then the Whig, and then the Republican positions were consistently for a tariff for protection, there has always been an effort to appease opposition and to cure certain disadvantages which grow out of such legislation. Let me illustrate: All of us know that tariff legislation offers an unusual field for logrolling; all of us know that when, through tariff legislation, industry is uprooted by materially changing most of the tariff schedules, it is bound to have a very deleterious effect on the employment of labor; first, because such legislation brings about a condition of uncertainty and capital will not invest in any enterprise when the one taking the risk does not know under what tariff schedule he is going to have to operate.

Tariff legislation, therefore, where the promise is to reduce tariff rates always throws business into a state of uncertainty, to be followed instantly by slowing down and unemployment.

Lawmakers have always wondered how they could get away from the untoward situation, that every time there is a threat to change the tariff schedules we inevitably face complete interruption of business and the danger of unemployment. The first suggestion, going back nearly to Civil War days, was that we ought to find a way by which we could revise the tariff by schedules without taking up all the schedules at the same time. The question was, if the textile industry, for instance, under the growth of competition from Europe, were endangered by the cheaper imported article, while other commodities were not affected in the same way, would it be possible for us to revise the textile schedule without touching any other schedule in the tariff law? If the commodity involved was wool, the question was, Can we not take up the wool schedule and deal with that and not deal with any of the others? That idea for a long while had a great appeal, and I have no doubt that every Senator will recall how it was discussed in the magazines.

We usually say that a reformer performs the function of announcing his reform and then goes out of existence, his followers taking it up and working it out. That probably is true in some cases, but it was not true in this one. That discussion ran through decades, but finally the idea was abandoned on the ground that Congress never could be induced to agree to deal with 1 only of the 15 schedules of the tariff law to the exclusion of all others; that the moment Congress took up one schedule and it was sought to favor one item, voters would say, "Well, we have an industry in our district or in our State which is suffering just as badly as that one, and we are going to have that considered if you are going to take this up." So that theory which held sway for a long while in the mind of certain legislators had to be abandoned. I think Col. Theodore Roosevelt was at one time very strongly in favor of that particular plan of tariff revision.

Later Colonel Roosevelt suggested the Tariff Commission. I do not mean he was the first one to suggest it, but he was the first important personage to obtain national recognition of that method of tariff revision. All Senators will recall how bitterly the proposal was fought. It was said, "That is a step toward tariff legislation away from the legislative body, because a Tariff Commission must be executive unless it is created through appointment by the Congress, that is partially by the Senate, partially by the House of Representatives, and partially by the President." So that suggestion was bitterly assailed.

I always felt that it was a step in the right direction and that from it no serious harm could result. I had felt and still feel that tariff legislation, in order to be effective, logical, and philosophic, must be the result of painstaking investigation, examination, and recommendation by a group of experts, who ought to have the ability to tell what it is best to do in the particular case.

Senators will recall that finally, under President Taft, a board was created which was called a "tariff board." It was not christened "tariff commission." That tariff board was very bitterly assailed by those who were opposed to the principle of protection, and ultimately, after it had been in existence for some time, when those who believed in the theory of tariff for revenue only came into control of the Government, they refused to make the necessary appropriations to permit the tariff board to carry on; and so it died for want of appropriations to administer it. The law never was repealed; but the tariff board just simply went out of existence.

Then later the idea of the Tariff Commission was revived, and when it received the endorsement and strong advocacy of Woodrow Wilson it was given life and it became an instrumentality for tariff making.

Mr. President, since that day even the Tariff Commission has gone through many changes. The old tariff board was the first semblance of an attempt to effect tariff changes by means of a board of experts. That was followed by the Tariff Commission. Since that time there have been several changes. The original Tariff Commission had nothing to do but to gather facts. It scarcely was given authority to make recommendations. It had not much more authority than the old tariff board had. Later the Tariff Commission was given greater power than that.

I believe in the Tariff Commission. I think it is a step in the right direction of getting away from the logrolling method of levying duties on articles imported into the country. I would be opposed to the elimination of the Tariff Commission. Yet at the same time, with all the advantage of having an expert body to give us the facts upon which the Congress may act, we still have an element of logrolling in tariff legislation. Anyone can see why that is true, because the recommendations of the Commission cannot be more than mere recommendations. They have no binding force. When their recommendations have come to the Congress they have been open to all sorts of amendments from all sorts of interests, and thus we have with us still the element of logrolling.

I have been giving my attention to the gradual changes in the attitude of the Congress as reflected in the creation of the Tariff Commission and the successive amendments under which from time to time greater power has been given to the Commission. I went along with all those provisions without any reluctance. I felt that a very unfortunate situation was created in connection with the enactment of tariff legislation not only because it uprooted business, throwing the whole country into a state of uncertainty, but also because there was a certain element of give and take which was not entirely conducive to the public welfare.

When the proposal was made to write into the tariff law the flexible provision, giving to the President certain legislative authority in connection with tariff rates which up to that time had never been even dreamed of, I confess that it somewhat startled me, if it did not shock me.

I have never been much concerned with the question of whether the tariff is or is not a tax. The question of the delegation of the taxing power was not at that time in my mind. In campaign after campaign in which the tariff question was discussed, the controversy as to whether the tariff was a tax and who paid the tax was prominent. Every Senator knows and will recall with what force, pro and con, the argument along that line has been presented. I cannot imagine anyone saying that a tariff duty is not a tax. I think everyone will admit that it is a form of tax. While there may not be much division among the people as to whether or not it is a tax, there is a tremendous division, if I may use the term "tremendous" in that connection, as to who pays it. I admit that if we put a tax upon coffee, the American consumer pays it. If we put a tax on anything we do not produce, whatever tax in the form of a duty is levied the American consumer, of course, has to pay. If those who espouse that doctrine were consistent in their views on a tariff for revenue only they would seek to place a tax upon such goods as we do not produce and must have, because that would insure revenue. If there is no other consideration except to get revenue, then a tax on coffee or tea or rubber or silk insures revenue, and whatever revenue is raised by a tax on such articles is assessed to the consumer.

That is not so, however, where the tax is put on a competing article. If a tariff tax is put on tin in order to stimulate the domestic production of tin, not only will this country produce the tin it needs, but it will be produced at a lower figure to the consumer than before the tax was imposed. Nobody can say in that case that the consumer pays the tax, because the tax is the agency by which the price paid by the consumer is reduced.

Mr. President, some years ago I was in an audience when President McKinley, then Major McKinley, was running for Governor of my State against a very distinguished Democratic Governor who then was in office. Governor Campbell, the Democratic Governor, a warm personal friend of mine, made this startling statement in that campaign:

> I will pledge myself to swallow all the tin that will ever be produced under the McKinley Act.

He did not know what kind of a task he was undertaking when he made that statement, because it was not very long before the United States had the largest and the third largest tin mills in the world. The largest was at New Castle, Pa., and the third largest was at Elwood, Ind.; and we reached the point where we not only produced all the tin we consumed at a lower price than we had ever previously paid for it but we became one of the great exporters of the world.

Nobody could say that the tax which stimulated that industry was paid by the consumer, for under it the consumer was paying less than before it was put on; and so, as to the question of whether or not the tariff actually is a tax, I do not think there is any serious dispute about it; but as to who pays the tax there is a field of dispute. I do not see how there is any real ground for dispute, however, unless the home competition fails to reduce the price to the consumer.

It has been claimed that under a protective system the producers will get together and fix prices so that they will have a monopoly, and therefore that the price will not be reduced, as it would be if they were in open competition; in other words, that reduction of price forced by competition fails because there is not any real competition, in that the competitors act together. There has been legislation enacted designed to prevent such practices.

Mr. President, I recall very distinctly, as probably most other Senators do, that when it was charged against the protective policy that it produced trusts all over the country, that argument was totally negatived by the mere recital of the fact that most of the great trusts then existing in the United States dealt in articles on which there was no tariff at all. Therefore that argument could not hold; but it was one of the arguments that were offered to claim the attention of the public.

I have mentioned the question which was discussed here yesterday, namely, how Congress may safely delegate to the Executive the exercise of the function of taxation. That question was not involved, of course, in any legislation up to the time of the flexible provision.

As I stated, when the flexible provision was first proposed to be written into law my reaction to it was very adverse; but I recognized the fact that if we maintained the scientific method of tariff legislation based upon the findings of a group of experts in the Tariff Commission, and then confined the President's action to the articles on the dutiable list, and also limited him within a given percentage, in all probability we would remove the element of logrolling; and not only that, but we would bring about the only method by which we could not only deal with a schedule without taking up all others but we could even deal with but one item of a schedule without taking up all the other items.

I voted with much reluctance for the flexible-tariff provision in the law when it was first written, but I did so with the argument in mind which I have just presented, that it was the first and only opportunity ever presented to Congress to avoid opening up the whole tariff question and disrupting the business of the whole Nation, and also to limit the number of items with which we dealt.

That argument appealed to me, and I voted for the bill, though with some reluctance. I agree with those who state that that was the opening wedge. That is where the camel got his nose under the tent. It may have been a mistake. When we take the first step there is no telling how soon the second step will be taken, how much longer the second step will be, and how long it will be until our exceptional step becomes our daily walk. That is the danger in these innovations; and I see clearly that that step was the basis on which this legislation is now demanded.

Mr. President, while it is perfectly justifiable for any Senator or legislator, in the course of his public duties to change his attitude if he can find a basis on which it should be done, and his action in doing so is not subject to condemnation, it is difficult for me to understand how any man who was strongly opposed to the first step, and who concisely and powerfully stated his opposition at the time of the original legislation, can so easily abandon his opposition, swallow all his words, and leap so much farther than the original step. The exigency must be tremendous to justify such a course. I do not think it exists in this case.

There is not any consistency in political life, no matter how much one may desire to be consistent. It has been the rule, I think, in every country—I know it has been in ours—that a leader who takes a position today may tomorrow completely reverse his position.

I think the most outstanding example is the case of Thomas Jefferson, a strict constructionist, a believer in the Bill of Rights, a believer in State rights as against central government, a man greatly concerned about the Federal Government going beyond its field, who came to the Presidency feeling the necessity of responsible power. One of the first problems that confronted him was what to do about the great territory west of the Mississippi owned by France, but which had been changing hands, once belonging to Spain and then to France, and which at the time was in danger of becoming the possession of Great Britain. Jefferson saw no way by which he could purchase Louisiana. There was not any authority in the Constitution, as he read it, to do so. France and Great Britain were at war, and it seemed very certain that Great Britain would win. Jefferson faced what he regarded as the fatal possibility of Great Britain coming into possession of all the territory west of the Mississippi River. Whether or not he knew it as well as we do now, of course none of us can know, but I am impressed with the belief that he knew that where Great Britain once plants her foot she does not lift it again, and he saw the possibility of the boundary of the United States being permanently fixed at the Mississippi, with the mother country owning the territory on the west, the consequences of which nobody could foresee.

With that picture in his mind, whatever might have been his dream of what the Nation in the ultimate might become, he counseled with such men as Albert Gallatin, who was, perhaps, next in ability to Hamilton. When he laid the picture before his Secretary of the Treasury, who was as well a great lawyer, Gallatin told him there was nothing for him to do except to proceed to purchase the territory. Jefferson replied to Gallatin that he had no power to purchase it, and he suggested the feasibility of having submitted an amendment to the Constitution granting him power to purchase it. But Gallatin, the practical-minded man, informed the President that long before the amendment could be ratified what was to be done would be done, and the deed would be closed. He said to Jefferson, "The thing to do is to buy it."

Later Jefferson said, in a letter:

> I proceeded to purchase Louisiana, and I stretched the Constitution until it almost cracked.

I think that was one of the greatest deeds of Jefferson's life, yet it was in direct opposition to the fundamental theory of the President being held to a strict view of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I have it not in my mind severely to criticize persons because they take a position on a question today diametrically opposed to their stand only a short time ago. It is only a suggestion that they believe there exists some very serious emergency.

I shall not today discuss the possibilities locked up in the proposal before us. I intend to discuss them early next week, confining myself entirely to the potentialities of the legislation, because I want to give my opinion of the trend of Congress in abdicating its authority, especially in view of the ease with which the second step is taken after the first. I am much concerned about where we are going, in the light of what we see happening.

On yesterday we were privileged to hear one of the most powerful dissertations upon the constitutional phase of this proposed legislation it has ever been my pleasure to listen to. I doubt whether the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] ever reached a higher level than that he reached yesterday in discussing that question. When I think of how the taxing power is reserved to this body by the organic law, the Constitution of the United States, which cannot be changed except by the people who made it; when I reflect that without an effort to change it we resort to such expedients as we did in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, namely, delegate to a Cabinet officer the power to lay a tax not only on every consumer but on behalf of a limited number of producers, violating two features, the very fundamentals, of the Constitution; when I realize that in the same law we authorized a second breach of the Constitution by appropriating money out of the Treasury, by the law which created the authority, before the money is collected and turned into the Treasury, violating directly the constitutional limitation on the expenditure of Federal money; when I think of the ease with which we are moving today in these directions, I become absolutely concerned. But that is only one phase of the discussion.

I desire to take more time than I have today to discuss that phase of the proposal, and then I shall discuss the error in its philosophy, which I think we ought to avoid. But I will not go further than I have gone today, as I have just been notified that another Senator would like to be heard at this time.

CONTROL OF ARMS AND MUNITIONS TRAFFIC (S.DOC. NO. 180)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have been gratified to learn that, pursuant to a resolution of the Senate, a committee has been appointed to investigate the problems incident to the private manufacture of arms and munitions of war and the international traffic therein. I earnestly recommend that this committee receive the generous support of the Senate, in order that it may be enabled to pursue the investigation with which it is charged with a degree of thoroughness commensurate with the high importance of the questions at issue. The executive departments of the Government will be charged to cooperate with the committee to the fullest extent in furnishing it with any information in their possession which it may desire to receive, and their views upon the adequacy or inadequacy of existing legislation and of the treaties to which the United States is a party for the regulation and control of the manufacture of and traffic in arms.

The private and uncontrolled manufacture of arms and munitions and the traffic therein has become a serious source of international discord and strife. It is not possible, however, effectively to control such an evil by the isolated action of any one country. The enlightened opinion of the world has long realized that this is a field in which international action is necessary. The negotiation of the Convention for the Supervision of the International Trade in Arms and Ammunition and in Implements of War, signed at Geneva, June 17, 1925, was an important step in the right direction. That convention is still before the Senate. I hope that the Senate may find it possible to give its advice and consent to its ratification. The ratification of that convention by this Government, which has been too long delayed, would be a concrete indication of the willingness of the American people to make their contribution toward the suppression of abuses which may have disastrous results for the entire world if they are permitted to continue unchecked.

It is my earnest hope that the representatives of the nations who will reassemble at Geneva on May 29 will be able to agree upon a convention containing provisions for the supervision and control of the traffic in arms much more far-reaching than those which were embodied in the convention of 1925. Some suitable international organization must and will take such action. The peoples of many countries are being taxed to the point of poverty and starvation in order to enable governments to engage in a mad race in armaments which, if permitted to continue, may well result in war. This grave menace to the peace of the world is due in no small measure to the uncontrolled activities of the manufacturers and merchants of engines of destruction, and it must be met by the concerted action of the peoples of all nations.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 18, 1934.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask that the message be referred to the Special Committee on Investigation of Munitions Industry recently appointed. It seems to me the message should go to that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be referred to the special committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, as one of the joint authors, with the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], of the resolution which the President so graciously and so heartily commends, and as a member of the select committee, I desire to express my keen appreciation of the vigorous word the President has sent to the Senate, and his complete opening of all branches of administrative cooperation to the great work which we have in hand. The President may be assured that, under the able leadership of the Senator from North Dakota, this probe will proceed to the utmost limits and to the maximum of constructive results. It can easily become the most powerful peace factor in this modern world.

I am hopeful that under the impulse of this message the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate will seriously consider the need for a substantially increased appropriation above the limit of the $15,000 allowed to the committee for its heavy task, so that the job may be done as completely as the President and the committee and the country want it done.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I wish to express my appreciation of the words which the Senator from Michigan has spoken. For the information of the Senate, I may say that the committee which has been named to carry on the investigation of the munitions industry is proving one of the most cooperative, I believe, it has ever been the good fortune of the Senate to name. There is unity of purpose on the part of the committee membership, and, with the aid which I am sure the Senate will give when additional funds shall be provided, I feel secure in assuring the Senate that the study being undertaken will be most thorough and sweeping.

I hope the committee will be in position, before this day shall end, to announce the man who is to lead in the research in connection with the investigation and represent the committee as its counsel.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what was it the Senator was announcing, the appointment of the committee to investigate the munitions industry, in connection with the President's message?

Mr. NYE. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. I was hoping the Senator was making some announcement about the message on the N.R.A. Has the Senator made any announcement about that lately? What has become of that?

Mr. NYE. The Senator has made no such announcement, but I expect there will be an announcement made before long.

Mr. LONG. When are we to get the message? What is wrong that we cannot get hold of that document? I have been trying to get it for some time.

FARM CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES AND IN RUSSIA

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement and an article appearing on May 10 in the St. Paul Dispatch, with reference to Russia.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator state what it is?

Mr. SCHALL. It is an article pertaining to Russia, printed in the St. Paul Dispatch on May 10.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I note from an examination of the article the Senator has sent to the desk that he has an address, apparently, connected with the newspaper article. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it is a violation of the rules of the Senate to print the address without reading.

Mr. SCHALL. Then I will have the clerk read it, if there is any objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that would be better.

Mr. SCHALL. I ask that the clerk read the statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I have just read an article in the St. Paul Dispatch of May 10 about Soviet Russia, which points out at least one of the blessings of communism and a collective state, namely, starvation of its teachers. Here in this country our children hear so much about the better conditions that prevail under some other form of government that it must have been enlightening for them to hear the true conditions. In Minnesota especially has the Farmer-Labor Party, as the party in control of the State administration, decided that it will proceed forthwith to install a program à la Russia by taking over the factories and other economic institutions, and by setting up a plant for printing textbooks where the soviet doctrine may have free sway.

The Farmer-Labor Party left the farmers out of its soviet program largely because they are being subjugated and regimented by the Democratic administration in Washington, which, not being satisfied with the stringent rules laid down in the original Agricultural Adjustment Act and in the Bankhead Act, under which their property is to be confiscated if they do not obey the dictates of a Washington bureaucracy, is now trying to impose regimentation and subjugation on all farm products. But the weather has set in to upset their program, for in the Middle West we have just been visited by the worst dust storm in history, which left havoc in its wake, with strong prospects of hunger and starvation, as a reward for the administration's efforts in destroying crops and in killing and burning livestock.

The Democratic administration, like the Farmer-Labor platform, is evidently trying to emulate Russia, where, according to another article in the same paper, there is trouble in raising crops because of drought, in spite of regimentation, and Government inspectors checking up on livestock, acres, bushels, and bales.

We should hesitate to install a Russian program in my State or in our country to supplant the democracy of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt, in spite of all the good we hear about communism from the Farmer-Labor program in Minnesota and the "brain trust" in Washington.

I ask leave to insert the two articles in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Paul (Minn.) Dispatch, May 10, 1934]

RUSSIAN TEACHERS UNPAID FOR MONTHS—STEAL WOODEN CROSSES FROM GRAVES TO KEEP FIRES GOING

By William H. Stoneman

Moscow, May 10.—The plight of 10 village school teachers in Mikhailova, a village in the central black earth region, who were forced to steal crosses from the local cemetery in order to keep their fires going last winter, was reported today by the official Moscow newspaper, Izvestia, in connection with the campaign for the payment of teachers' salaries.

Unpaid for 3 or 4 months because of the complacence of local officials, these teachers, reports Izvestia, received nothing to eat except ancient vegetables and, being unable to afford kerosene, had to do their night work by the light of fagots.

When the secretary of the regional executive committee heard that the teachers were raiding the graveyard for wood, he is reported to have replied: "That is splendid. They are combining our fiscal interests with antireligious propaganda."

The teachers' complaints against unedible rations were answered by the retort, "What do you expect to eat—truffles?"

For weeks now there has been an intensive press campaign for the payment of teachers' salaries, which in five different districts are nearly 10,000,000 rubles in arrears. Unfortunately, many of the officials responsible for this situation either do not read newspapers or have already used up the money which the budgets assigned to the teachers.

SOVIET ALARMED AT PROLONGED DROUGHT—HOT SUN BAKES FIELDS IN AREAS PRODUCING THREE FOURTHS OF RUSSIA'S WHEAT

By William H. Stoneman

Moscow (via Berlin), May 10.—Soviet officials are beginning to show extreme concern over the prolonged drought which has been laying siege to the rich grain fields of the Ukraine and north Caucasus for the past 2 months, and which already seems to have ruined the chances for anything better than a fair crop in those regions this year.

Since 1921, the year of the nation-wide famine, the Soviets have been riding their luck high, wide, and handsome, as far as the weather has been concerned, giving rise to the drollery that "God is always on the side of the Bolsheviks." Their only two crop failures during the intervening period came in 1931, when the region from the Volga to the Chinese frontier was parched, and in 1932, when the peasants refused to sow and reap their crops because of the resentment at the confiscatory methods of the Government.

All during the period of collectivization the weather has been good enough to compensate largely for the discontent of the farm population.

Day after day during recent weeks the charts of the agricultural newspaper, Socialist Agriculture, have shown nothing but baking sunshine in the Ukraine, Caucasus, and Volga districts, which together produce two thirds of Russia's grain and perhaps three quarters of its wheat. When this correspondent visited the southern districts 2 weeks ago every official encountered had the word "rain" on his tongue while the peasants constantly scanned the skies for the trace of a cloud. Numerous people asked for information regarding American rain-making devices, and were disappointed to learn that they were nothing but fakes.

The political results of a bad crop this year would be unfortunate, to say the least. Collectivized agriculture is just geting onto its feet, partly because of the good crop last year, which allowed the Government to leave sufficient food with the peasantry, and partly because of the activities of the political sections, composed of party members dispatched from the cities.

If there is another good crop this year, the Soviet's position with respect to the peasantry should be considerably strengthened, and collectivization may once for all be established on a permanent basis. If there is a poor or catastrophically bad crop, nobody can predict the consequences.

The peasantry, which is still morose and devitalized by the ghastly famine of 1933, would unquestionably suffer again, though perhaps not to such an unthinkable degree as it did last year. The political sections, which are now functioning satisfactorily, would have their morale threatened and be forced to start work all over again.

Finally, the situation in the Far East might take a quick turn for the worse if the Japanese were to know that there was great difficulty behind the lines.

So far there is no reason to predict a truly bad crop unless one takes stock in the pre-war tradition that one catastrophic year is due in every decade, in which case the Soviet is long overdue to have one.

Generally speaking, the Soviet fields have been sown well before schedule and throughout the south most of the wheat fields have been planted with winter wheat, which can be counted on to give from 4½ to 7½ bushels to an acre, if well planted, even when there is no rain during the spring and summer. Spring crops—oats, barley, corn—would be the hardest hit in case of a prolonged drought.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

GEORGE THE THIRD AND ROOSEVELT THE SECOND

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the American Revolution of 1776 was precipitated by the action of George III in levying duties at American ports without consent of the colonial assemblies.

George III, as admitted and freely charged by William Pitt and Lord Chatham, by Fox, and Edmund Burke, had violated Magna Carta by assuming to himself the power of taxation without representation.

Article I of the American Constitution places the tariff-making power, the revenue power, as the first grant of power by the American people to Congress. The power to tax, which is the power to destroy, is the fundamental power of the legislative branch of government in every republic and every nation having a democratic constitution.

The administration demands that Congress delegate to the White House the legislative power to raise or lower tariff duties 50 percent, article I of the Constitution notwithstanding.

The administration demands that the Senate shall abdicate its coequal treaty-making function as provided in article II of the Constitution.

The administration already, under the flexible clause of the present tariff act, has the power to raise or lower tariff duties 50 percent after hearings and findings of fact by the United States Tariff Commission. The President appoints the controlling majority of that Commission. Recommendations of the White House receive consideration at the hands of the Tariff Commission. Why have a Tariff Commission if it is to be shorn of all participation as a fact-finding body in raising and lowering tariff duties?

That the administration already has all the tariff-making powers that it needs in making needed tariff changes is shown by the President himself in his message to Congress on May 9, in which he informs Congress:

Acting upon the unanimous recommendations of the United States Tariff Commission, I have today signed a proclamation, under the so-called "flexible-tariff provisions" of the Tariff Act of 1930, reducing the rate of duty on sugar.

He estimates the reduction of the duty from 2 cents to 1½ cents a pound on Cuban sugar, consistent with the terms of the Jones-Costigan bill (H.R. 8861).

This reduction of duty on sugar proves that the President has ample power under existing law to revise the tariff without violation of the Constitution, without resorting to imperial secret actions, without placing all the industries of the country under the pall of uncertainty, and without destroying the confidence of the people in the Government.

What the White House has done with regard to the duty on sugar, under the Constitution and by aid of the Tariff Commission created by law, the White House can do with regard to all other tariff duties—give the industries affected the right of a public hearing before a fact-finding commission without secrecy and without fear of arbitrary and unconstitutional acts by the Executive.

Thus, the United States Senate in 1934 is confronted with the issue of 1776, when George III assumed the tariff-making power and precipitated the Boston Tea Party, and the same issue as that of 1215, when the farmer barons at Runnymede compelled King John to sign Magna Carta and surrender the taxing power to the Commons.

Strangely enough, the same Senators who, in drafting the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922, and the Hawley-Smoot Act of 1930, were appalled at the flexible-tariff provision which authorized the President to sign a tariff change arrived at after hearings and testimony and published findings by a Tariff Commission are the Senate leaders today who are in favor of dispensing with Tariff Commission hearings and delivering to Roosevelt, the second, the tariff-making powers unlawfully exercised by George III.

Among the leading Democratic orators who made the Capitol dome echo with thunders against the flexible tariff were the honorable chairman of the present Senate Finance Committee, the eloquent Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Democratic floor manager, the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. In the lower House one of the leading orators against the flexible tariff was the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Hull, our present Secretary of State, who said at the time that "no honest President would ask such power, and no President, however honest he might be, should have it." One can enumerate something like 30 Senators today with seats in the Senate who were horrified at the "unconstitutional" demand of the White House during the terms of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover for tariff-making power—Senators who today are not even satisfied with the flexible power after hearings and findings of the Tariff Commission, but demand that Congress go one step further and give the White House direct power to act without Tariff Commission findings.

The Senate Chamber for 100 years has resounded to the eloquence of Democratic orators protesting against Executive encroachment upon the revenue power—the chief power of Congress.

As recently as October 2, 1929, a Senate majority of 47 to 42—including 33 Democrats and 14 Republicans—was so strongly opposed to yielding the White House any tariff-making powers beyond signing an act of Congress, that they voted to repeal even the flexible clause and voted for the Simmons amendment to require the President to submit the Tariff Commission report to Congress to insure constitutional enactment. A majority of the Senators in this Chamber may well recall the words and the committee recommendations submitted on that day by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who—pages 4138, 4139 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—submitted the report of the select committee on the Investigation of the United States Tariff Commission.

The first recommendation of this committee, signed "Jos. T. Robinson, Wm. Cabell Bruce, Robert M. La Follette, Jr.", provided:

(1) That the flexible provision of the Tariff Act of 1922, particularly section 315, be repealed.

The Senate, including all Democrats, except 2 from Louisiana, 1 from Florida, and 1 from Iowa, only one of whom was reelected, did not believe that it accorded with American principles to allow a President the power to sign a tariff revision even after investigation and recommendation by the United States Tariff Commission.

Among the reasons named by the Senate committee headed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] were these:

It is impracticable for the President to devote the time and attention essential to the proper performance of the duties imposed upon him by the flexible tariff law. The Chief Executive is already overburdened with executive duties.

And 47 Senators agreed to this, including all the Democrats excepting 4, of whom 3 were defeated for reelection.

Concerning the one remaining Democrat, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], it must be said that he also advocated an amendment of the flexible-tariff section by requiring the President to submit the proposed tariff revision to Congress—the Presidential duty not to become effective unless Congress failed to act within 6 months. But 32 Democrats, including the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Democratic chairmen, I believe of every committee of the present Senate, voted "nay" even on the Fletcher amendment of October 2, 1929. See page 4149. There was too much tariff-making power granted to the President—so the Democrats and 14 Republicans, including myself, voted—even though the President had to submit his proposed revision with the findings of the Tariff Commission to Congress and gave Congress 6 months in which to amend the change of duty.

Further, the Senate committee headed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] declared:

Tariff making and revision under our Constitution are legislative duties, and to impose such responsibilities upon the President as are carried in the flexible provision confuses legislative and executive responsibility.

And 47 Senators agreed to that, including 33 Democrats, 14 Republicans, including myself, and all the Democratic chairmen of the present Senate, including the Senator from Mississippi, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, in charge of the present White House bill.

This committee of investigation made a report, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], that not only filled two pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD but a learned report which for economic thought appealed to all Democrats on the Senate Finance Committee and for legal and constitutional erudition appealed to all Democratic jurists on the Senate Judiciary Committee headed by the learned Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], who cast his every vote against White House encroachment on the tariff-making powers of Congress.

Because this or that European or Asiatic monarch has the power of secret diplomacy to change tariff duties overnight is no reason why the American people and American industries and American labor should be subject to the will of a monarch. Foreign powers have ways of their own which the American Republic is not bound to copy. The presence of 130,000,000 citizens in our 48 States is ample proof that the ways of Old World potentates, under which our ancestors once lived, are ways which freemen seek to flee.

One of the chief causes why the United States has double the population of any country under a king and an industrial production greater than that of any four European countries combined, is that the taxing power, which includes tariff making, has been taken from the Executive, whether king or other potentate, and placed in a Congress elective by the people, and representative of their industrial needs, under a Constitution of their own creation.

One of the most astounding revelations with regard to this White House demand is the apparent surrender by the Senate majority and by members of the President's Cabinet of all their proclaimed convictions on the very issue involved in this tariff bill.

The Constitution, Mr. President, has not changed since October 1929 with reference to the tariff-making powers of Congress. Have the convictions of Democratic Senators been changed, like so many political weather vanes? I shall never believe it, Mr. President, except on the record of their own recorded votes. I shall continue to believe that the Ship of State is still safely anchored to the Constitution, until I hear the rats scrambling from the hold to jump into an uncertain sea.

It seems that Will Rogers, himself a Democrat without hypocrisy and gifted with an American sense of humor, has grasped the essence of the new deal when he declares that the new-deal Democracy means:

Equal rights for none; special privileges for all.

To that he should have added the provision, "Provided, that special privileges go only to those who carry a Blue Eagle and subscribe to Farley's campaign fund."

American protests against this reversal of American history by giving to Roosevelt, the second, the unlawful powers of George III are coming from every American industry, if not from every American State, city, and county.

Unanimous approval of this tariff bill comes only from abroad. Are we here to represent the American people, American industries and employment, or the Europeans and European industries and employment?

The highest enthusiasm for this tariff bill comes from Great Britain and the British possessions. A press cable from Australia announces great enthusiasm there for the White House tariff bill, because Australia and New Zealand see in America their best future market for beef products, wool, and butter, which they will gladly exchange at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, and San Francisco for farm machinery, motor cars, Yankee notions, and cigarettes. India will send us wool and long-staple cotton in exchange for cars and calico. Canada will send us wheat, milk, and butter in trade for farm machinery and gasoline.

In short, this tariff bill has boomed British markets to a point comparable with the $14 premium which we are paying on gold from British mines, which caused the gold-mine stocks of Johannesburg to rise 100 percent at the opening of the present year. No wonder that Great Britain, Canada, and Australia have a market boom and balanced budgets when the White House and a subservient Congress are doing all in their power to build up Europe at the expense of the United States.

EFFECT OF TARIFF THREAT ON HOME MARKETS

If we turn to the financial page of the New York Times, leading New York organ of the administration, we can there read for ourselves in the Sunday issue of May 6 the logical effect of this tariff threat as affecting the volume of stock-market transactions, commodity prices, and employment.

Page N–11 of the financial page tells us that in the week ended May 5, 1934, only 6,991,764 shares of stock changed hands, as compared with 26,279,787 shares in the same week a year ago and before the N.R.A. and threat of tariff revolution paralyzed the market. The shrinkage from over 26,000,000 shares to less than 7,000,000—a shriveling of nearly 75 percent—reflects the normal reaction of the investing public to a bedlam of bold experiments which the dynasty in power chooses to call "recovery."

American industry, which employs American labor, buys American materials, and affords a field for the savings of American investors, is at the mercy of a smiling dictatorship which has no regard for consequences, for constitutional guarantees, or for legislative representation in Congress.

American industry and employment, if this tariff bill passes, may not stand under what is called the "sword of Damocles", but will halt under what may prove to be more disastrous—the uncontrolled edict of a bold experimenter who knows little and cares less about the conditions and factors that make for successful industry and sustained employment.

Turn to page N–15 of the same issue of the New York Times, May 6, and you will read the monthly report of the American Federation of Labor, which tells you that in the employment field "ground has been lost since October under the operations of the N.R.A."

That—

The individual worker in industry made no gain whatever in real wages from March 1933 to March 1934.

That—

At the end of March 10,900,000 workers were still unemployed.

That the present month of May, with the dull winter months past, there are still 10,000,000 workers unemployed at American mills and factories.

And now comes a tariff threat, throwing into chaos all plans of legitimate industry for expansion of production and employment. Under the former and existing system of hearings before the Tariff Commission, an opportunity is afforded the factory management to develop plans to meet tariff changes. Under the proposed Executive dictatorship, clouded in secrecy which not even Congress is permitted to share, the factory management has no chance whatever—except through Government "leaks" which go to favorites.

Under such a condition, abhorrent to all believers in American freedom and law, imagine the life of an industry which once labored in the faith that the flag and the Constitution were guarantees of industrial liberty. Without favoritism and "leaks" from the White House, an industry subject to disasters from tariff making by secret bold experiments has no option but to curtail its program of expansion and live from hand to mouth. And labor will suffer the consequences of uncertain employment.

In letting down the bars for certain foreign goods the American industry affected thereby will be sacrificed. The genius of this tariff bill is to leave that question to the President. The judgment of Congress, pursuant to article I of the Constitution, is to be prohibited, and the White House becomes the exclusive judge as to what industry must go on the block, or be cast in penal servitude for a 3-year term.

The White House will be judge and jury up to 50 percent of all exercise of tariff power—and 50 percent is just as effective for all practical purposes and results as 100 percent. A 50-percent lowering of the bars is all the foreign competitor asks—he can jump over the remainder of the fence if half the top is torn off.

Both the N.R.A. and the A.A.A., if they have had any marked effect, have boosted American production costs. The 350 N.I.R.A. codes compel price boosting in American markets at the penalty of fine and imprisonment. The $1,000,000,000 of estimated A.A.A. processing taxes from now till 1936 must all be added to industrial production costs. The N.R.A. and A.A.A. and 37 other alphabetical doles, which are adding $10,000,000,000 to public debt and a yearly interest burden and increased taxes, must all be absorbed by industry in the shape of increased production costs. Not lower but higher tariff fences are forced to protect American industry during the next 2 years.

If there is any method of blocking recovery, if there is any burden to crush legitimate industry and rob the consumer that we have not yet heard of, just wait another week until the "brain trust" boys recover from the booking agencies of the Kentucky Derby. If they did not pick up another bold experiment at the Derby, watch out for them when they get over the Preakness.

The pending tariff bill is the ripened experiment born of the fishing trip on the Caribbean Sea. The bonus of $14 an ounce on gold seems to have been the idea which Morgenthau senior and Barney Baruch brought back from London and Paris on their trip over there last summer and fall.

Congress has become a Democratic caucus. And a Democratic caucus, as defined by George Rothwell Brown, a Democratic paragrapher, is a place where politicians loaf around until somebody calls up the White House.

Hereafter, we will not have to go to the trouble of calling up the White House. After the Senate shall have abdicated both its treaty-making power and its tariff-making power, the White House will cut its Capitol wires, except to such

Senator who wants a "leak" for some contributor to Farley's campaign fund. And this was once a Republic, this was a Nation, instead of a bold experiment in patent medicines; this was the Senate, instead of a doormat for the "brain trust."

SUPERVISION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN ARMS

As in executive session,

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to report back favorably with a reservation from the Committee on Foreign Relations, Executive H, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, being "A convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition and in the implements of war", signed at Geneva, Switzerland, on June 17, 1925, and I submit a report (Ex. Rept. No. 4) thereon. I ask that the accompanying resolution be read into the RECORD, that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the convention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be received, the injunction of secrecy will be removed from the convention, and the resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved (two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive H, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, "A convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition and in the implements of war", signed at Geneva, Switzerland, on June 17, 1925, subject to the reservation that the said convention shall not come into force so far as the United States is concerned until it shall have come into force in respect to Belgium, the British Empire, Czechoslovakia, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Sweden, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The convention is as follows:

[Executive H, 69th Cong., 1st sess.]

SUPERVISION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN ARMS

CONVENTION FOR THE SUPERVISION OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION AND IN IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

GERMANY, THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, BRAZIL, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, CANADA, THE IRISH FREE STATE AND INDIA, BULGARIA, CHILE, CHINA, COLOMBIA, DENMARK, EGYPT, SPAIN, ESTHONIA, ABYSSINIA, FINLAND, FRANCE, GREECE, HUNGARY, ITALY, JAPAN, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBURG, NICARAGUA, NORWAY, PANAMA, THE NETHERLANDS, PERSIA, POLAND, PORTUGAL, ROUMANIA, SALVADOR, SIAM, SWEDEN, SWITZERLAND, THE KINGDOM OF THE SERBS, CROATS AND SLOVENES, CZECHOSLOVAKIA, TURKEY, URUGUAY AND VENEZUELA

Whereas the international trade in arms and ammunition and in implements of war should be subjected to a general and effective system of supervision and publicity;

Whereas such a system is not provided by existing Treaties and Conventions;

Whereas in relation to certain areas of the world a special supervision of this trade is necessary in order to render more effective the measures adopted by the various Governments as regards both the import of such arms and ammunition and implements of war into these areas and their export therefrom; and

Whereas the export or import of arms, ammunition or implements, the use of which in war is prohibited by International Law, must not be permitted for such purpose;

Have decided to conclude a Convention and have accordingly appointed as their Plenipotentiaries:

[Here follow the names of the Plenipotentiaries.]

Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

CHAPTER I. CATEGORIES

ARTICLE 1

For the purposes of the present Convention, five Categories of arms, ammunition and implements are established:

CATEGORY I. ARMS, AMMUNITION AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR EXCLUSIVELY DESIGNED AND INTENDED FOR LAND, SEA OR AERIAL WARFARE

A.—Arms, ammunition and implements exclusively designed and intended for land, sea or aerial warfare, which are or shall be comprised in the armament of the armed forces of any State, or which, if they have been but are no longer comprised in such armament, are capable of military to the exclusion of any other use, except such arms, ammunition and implements which, though included in the above definition, are covered by other Categories.

Such arms, ammunition and implements are comprised in the following twelve headings:

1. Rifles, muskets, carbines.

2. (a) Machine-guns, automatic rifles and machine-pistols of all calibres;

(b) Mountings for machine guns;

(c) Interrupter gears.

3. Projectiles and ammunition for the arms enumerated in Nos. 1 and 2 above.

4. Gun-sighting apparatus including aerial gun-sights and bomb-sights, and fire-control apparatus.

5. (a) Cannon, long or short, and howitzers, of a calibre less than 5.9 inches (15 cm.);

(b) Cannon, long or short, and howitzers, of a calibre of 5.9 inches (15 cm.) or above;

(c) Mortars of all kinds;

(d) Gun carriages, mountings, recuperators, accessories for mountings.

6. Projectiles and ammunition of the arms enumerated in No. 5 above.

7. Apparatus for the discharge of bombs, torpedoes, depth charges and other kinds of projectiles.

8. (a) Grenades;

(b) Bombs;

(c) Land mines, submarine mines, fixed or floating, depth charges;

(d) Torpedoes.

9. Appliances for use with the above arms and apparatus.

10. Bayonets.

11. Tanks and armoured cars.

12. Arms and ammunition not specified in the above enumeration.

B.—Component parts, completely finished, of the articles covered by A above, if capable of being utilised only in the assembly or repair of the said articles, or as spare parts.

CATEGORY II. ARMS AND AMMUNITION CAPABLE OF USE BOTH FOR MILITARY AND OTHER PURPOSES

A.—1. Pistols and revolvers, automatic or self-loading, and developments of the same, designed for single-handed use or fired from the shoulder, of a calibre greater than 6.5 mm. and length of barrel greater than 10 cm.

2. Fire-arms designed, intended or adapted for non-military purposes, such as sport or personal defence, that will fire cartridges that can be fired from fire-arms in Category I; other rifled fire-arms firing from shoulder, of a calibre of 6 mm. or above, not included in Category I, with the exception of rifled fire-arms with a "break-down" action.

3. Ammunition for the arms enumerated in the above two headings, with the exception of ammunition covered by Category I.

4. Swords and lances.

B.—Component parts, completely finished, of the articles covered by A above, if capable of being utilised only in the assembly or repair of the said articles, or as spare parts.

CATEGORY III. VESSELS OF WAR AND THEIR ARMAMENT

1. Vessels of war of all kinds.

2. Arms, ammunition and implements of war mounted on board vessels of war and forming part of their normal armament.

CATEGORY IV

1. Aircraft, assembled or dismantled.

2. Aircraft engines.

CATEGORY V

1. Gunpowder and explosives, except common black gunpowder.

2. Arms and ammunition other than those covered by Categories I and II, such as pistols and revolvers of all models, rifled weapons with a "break down" action, other rifled fire-arms of a calibre of less than 6 mm. designed for firing from the shoulder, smooth-bore shot-guns, guns with more than one barrel of which at least one barrel is smooth-bore, fire-arms firing rimfire ammunition, muzzle-loading fire-arms.

CHAPTER II. SUPERVISION AND PUBLICITY

ARTICLE 2

The High Contracting Parties undertake not to export or permit the export of articles covered by Category I, except in accordance with the following conditions:

1. The export shall be for a direct supply to the Government of the importing State or, with the consent of such Goverment, to a public authority subordinate to it;

2. An order in writing, which shall be signed or endorsed by a representative of the importing Government duly authorised so to act, shall have been presented to the competent authorities of the exporting company. This order shall state that the articles to be exported are required for delivery to the importing Government or public authority as provided in paragraph 1.

ARTICLE 3

Nevertheless, export for supply to private persons may be permitted in the following cases:

1. Articles covered by Category I exported direct to a manufacturer of war material for use by him for the requirements of his industry, provided their import has been duly authorised by the Government of the importing country;

2. Rifles, muskets and carbines and their ammunition exported for supply to rifle associations formed for the encouragement of individual sport and duly authorised by their own Government to use them, the import of which is not contrary to any other provisions of the present Convention. Such arms and ammunition shall be sent direct to the Government of the importing country for transmission by such Government to the associations for which they are supplied.

3. Samples of articles covered by Category I exported for demonstration purposes direct to a trade representative of the exporting manufacturer, such representative being duly authorised by the Government of the importing country to receive them.

In the above-mentioned cases, an order in writing, endorsed by the Government of the importing country or by its representative duly authorised so to act, must have been presented to the authorities of the exporting country. It shall contain all the information necessary to show that the order is properly made under this Article.

ARTICLE 4

Permission to export under Articles 2 and 3 shall be signified by a license. An export declaration, if filed with and approved by the competent authorities of the exporting country, may take the place of a licence.

Such licence or declaration must contain:

(a) A description sufficient for the identification of the articles to which it relates, and giving their designation according to the headings in Category I, and their number or weight;

(b) The name and address of the exporter;

(c) The name and address of the importing consignee;

(d) The name of the Government which has authorised the import.

Each separate consignment which crosses the frontier of the exporting country, whether by land, water or air, shall be accompanied by a document containing the particulars indicated above. This document may be either the licence or export declaration or a certified copy thereof or a certificate issued by the Customs authorities of the exporting country, stating that the consignment is exported under licence or export declaration in accordance with the provisions of the present Convention.

ARTICLE 5

The articles covered by Category II shall only be exported under cover of an export document, which may be either a license issued by the competent authorities of the exporting country or an export declaration endorsed by or filed with them. If the legislation of the importing country requires the endorsement of a duly authorised representative of its Government, and if this fact has been notified by the said Government to the Government of the exporting country, then such an endorsement must have been obtained and submitted to the competent authorities of the exporting country before the export may take place.

Neither the license nor the export declaration shall entail any responsibility upon the Government of the exporting country as to the destination or ultimate use of any consignment.

Nevertheless, if the High Contracting Parties consider, on account of the size, destination or other circumstances of a consignment, that the arms and ammunition consigned are intended for war purposes, they undertake to apply to such consignment the provisions of Articles 2, 3 and 4.

ARTICLE 6

As a preliminary to a general system of publicity for armaments irrespective of their origin, the High Contracting Parties undertake to publish, within two months of the close of each quarter, a statistical return of their foreign trade during this quarter in the articles covered by Categories I and II. This return shall be drawn up in accordance with the specimen forms contained in Annex I to the present Convention and shall show under each heading appearing in Categories I and II in Article 1 the value and the weight or number of the articles exported or imported under a licence or export declaration, allocated according to country of origin or destination.

In all cases where the consignment comes from, or is sent to, a territory possessing an autonomous Customs system, such territory shall be shown as the country of origin or destination.

The High Contracting Parties further undertake, so far as each may be concerned, to publish within the same time-limits a return containing the same information in respect of the consignments of articles covered by Categories I and II to other territories placed under their sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage, or under the same sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage.

The first statistical return to be published by each of the High Contracting Parties shall be for the quarter beginning on the first day of January, April, July or October, subsequent to the date on which the present Convention comes into force with regard to the High Contracting Party concerned.

The High Contracting Parties undertake to publish as an annex to the above-mentioned return the text of the provisions of all statutes, orders or regulations in force within their territory dealing with the export and import of articles covered by Article 1, and to include therein all provisions enacted for the purpose of carrying out the present Convention. Amendments and additions to these provisions shall be likewise published in annexes to subsequent quarterly returns.

ARTICLE 7

The High Contracting Parties, in all cases covered by Category III, undertake to publish within two months of the close of each quarter a return for that quarter, giving the information detailed below for each vessel of war constructed, in course of construction or to be constructed within their territorial jurisdiction on behalf of the Government of another State:

(a) The date of the signing of the contract for the construction of the vessel, the name of the Government for which the vessel is ordered, together with the following data:

Standard displacement in tons and metric tons;

The principal dimensions, namely: length at water-line, extreme beam at or below water-line, mean draft at standard displacement;

(b) The date of laying the keel, the name of the Government for which the vessel is being constructed, together with the following data:

Standard displacement in tons and metric tons;

The principal dimensions, namely: length at water-line, extreme beam at or below water-line, mean draft at standard displacement;

(c) The date of delivery, the name of the Government to which the vessel is delivered, together with the following data with respect to the vessel at that date:

Standard displacement in tons and metric tons;

The principal dimensions, namely: length at water-line, extreme beam at or below water-line, mean draft at standard displacement;

As well as the following information regarding the armament installed on board the vessel at the date of delivery and forming part of the vessel's normal armament:

Number and calibre of guns;

Number and calibre of torpedo-tubes;

Number of bomb-throwers;

Number of machine-guns.

The above information concerning the armament of the vessel shall be furnished by means of a statement signed by the shipbuilder and countersigned by the commanding officer or such other representative fully authorised for the purpose by the Government of the State to whom the vessel is delivered. Such statement shall be transmitted to the competent authority of the Government of the constructing country.

Whenever a vessel of war belonging to one of the High Contracting Parties is transferred, whether by gift, sale or other mode of transfer, to the Government of another State, the transferor undertakes to publish within two months of the close of the quarter within which the transfer is effected the following information:

The date of transfer, the name of the Government to whom the vessel has been transferred and the data and information referred to in paragraph (c) above.

By the standard displacement in the present Article is to be understood the displacement of the vessel complete, fully manned, engined and equipped ready for sea, including all armament and ammunition, equipment, outfit, provisions and fresh water for crew, miscellaneous stores and implements of every description that are intended to be carried in war, but without fuel or reserve feed-water on board.

ARTICLE 8

Without prejudice to the provisions of Article 7, if the transport of any vessel of war is carried out otherwise than by such vessel's own motive power or towage, the vessel, whether assembled or in component parts, and the armament thereof will become subject also to the provisions of this Convention as if they were included in Category I.

ARTICLE 9

The High Contracting Parties undertake to publish, within six months of the close of each quarter, a return for that quarter of the export of aircraft and aircraft engines, giving quantities exported and their allocation according to country of destination.

ARTICLE 10

Subject to the provisions of Chapter III, the articles covered by Categories IV and V may be exported without formalities or restrictions.

ARTICLE 11

The High Contracting Parties undertake not to apply a more favourable regime to imports of articles referred to in Article 1 coming from territories of non-contracting States than that which they will apply to such imports coming from territories of contracting States, and to subject these imports, of whatever origin, to the same conditions of authorisation and, so far as possible, of publicity.

CHAPTER III. SPECIAL ZONES

ARTICLE 12

The High Contracting Parties agree that the provisions of this Chapter apply to the territorial and maritime zones hereinafter defined and referred to in the present Convention as the "special zones."

1. Land zone.

(a) The whole of the continent of Africa, with the exception of Egypt, Lybia, Tunisia, Algeria, the Spanish possessions in North Africa, Abyssinia, and of the Union of South Africa together with the territory under its mandate, and of Southern Rhodesia.

This zone also includes the adjacent islands which are situated within 100 marine miles from the coast thereof and also Prince's Island (Principe) in the Bight of Biafra, St. Thomas (São Thomé), Annobon and Socotra, but does not include the Spanish islands situated to the north of the parallel of 26° North latitude.

(b) The Arabian peninsula, Gwadar, Syria and Lebanon, Palestine and Transjordan, and Iraq.

2. Maritime zone.

A maritime zone, which includes the Red Sea, the Gulf of Aden, the Persian Gulf, and the Gulf of Oman and is bounded by a line drawn from and following the latitude of Cape Guardafui to the point of intersection with longitude 57° East of Greenwich and proceeding thence direct to the point at which the eastern frontier of Gwadar meets the sea.

ARTICLE 13

The High Contracting Parties undertake not to export or to permit articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V to be exported to places within the special zones, unless a licence has been issued in conformity with the conditions defined in Article 14.

An export declaration, if filed with and approved by the competent authorities of the exporting country, may take the place of a licence.

The High Contracting Parties also undertake, each in respect of any territory under its sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage situated within the special zones, not to permit articles covered by the Categories above mentioned to be imported into such territory unless their import has been authorised by the authorities of the territory concerned. Such articles shall only be admitted into territory within the special zones at such ports or other places as the authorities of the State, colony, protectorate or mandated territory concerned shall designate for this purpose.

ARTICLE 14

The High Contracting Parties undertake not to issue the export licences nor to approve the export declarations required under Article 13 unless they are satisfied that the conditions stated in paragraph (a) or (b) hereof are fulfilled and also, as regards articles covered by Categories I and II, the conditions laid down in Articles 2, 3, 4 and 5.

(a) That, if an export is being made to territory under the sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage of a High Contracting Party, articles covered by Categories I, II and IV to which the licence or export declaration applies are required for lawful purposes and that the authorities of the territory to which they are consigned are willing to admit them; and that, in the case of articles covered by Category V, a copy of the license or export declaration has been set to the authorities aforesaid before the export takes place.

(b) That, if an export is being made to territory which is not under the sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage of a High Contracting Party, articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V are required for lawful purposes.

ARTICLE 15

The High Contracting Parties undertake to publish, in addition to the returns provided for in Article 6 and Article 9 in respect of articles covered by Categories I, II and IV, a return of articles covered by Category V exported to territory situated within the special zones. This return shall be published within the same time-limits and at the same intervals as those provided in the first paragraph of Article 6, and shall contain, as far as possible, the same particulars.

ARTICLE 16

The trade in articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V within the special zones shall be placed under the supervision of officials of the authorities of the State, colony, protectorate or mandated territory concerned.

The admission and transit of and trade in such articles within the said zones shall also be subject to the provisions of Section I, §§ 1 and 2, of Annex II of the present Convention, to which provisions the High Contracting Parties undertake to conform.

An authorisation must be given by a duly authorised representative of the authorities aforesaid in each case before any such articles may be reconsigned to any place outside the territory to which they have been admitted.

ARTICLE 17

The manufacture, assembly and repair within the special zones of articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V shall be subject to the provisions of Section I, § 3, of Annex II of the present Convention, to which provisions the High Contracting Parties undertake to conform.

ARTICLE 18

The High Contracting Parties undertake, each in respect of any territory under its sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage situated within the special zones, not to permit the transit by land across such territory of articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V when their destination is another territory also situated in the special zones, unless their transport to their destination is assured and the authorities of the latter territory have authorized their import.

The prohibition referred to in the above paragraph shall not apply to the transit of such articles through a territory situated in the special zones when their destination is territory of one of the High Contracting Parties not included in the said zones, provided that their transport to their destination is assured.

If, for the purposes of transport to a territory situated within the special zones, it is necessary to pass through a contiguous territory likewise situated within the said zones, the transit shall be permitted, subject always to the conditions laid down in the first paragraph hereof, at the request of the authorities of the importing territory, provided that such authorities guarantee that the articles in respect of which the request is made shall not at any time be sold, or otherwise transferred, contrary to the provisions of the present Convention. Nevertheless, if the attitude or the disturbed condition of the importing State constitutes a threat to peace or public order, permission for transit shall be refused to such State by the authorities of all such contiguous territories until this threat has ceased to exist.

ARTICLE 19

Subject to any contrary provisions in existing special agreements or in any future agreements, provided that in all cases such agreements otherwise comply with the provisions of the present Convention, the High Contracting Parties agree that in the special zones the authorities of the State, colony, protectorate or mandated territory concerned shall carry out within their territorial waters the supervision and police measures necessary for the application of the present Convention.

ARTICLE 20

The High Contracting Parties agree that within the special zones no native vessel, as hereinafter defined, of less than 500 tons (net tonnage) shall be allowed to ship, discharge of transship articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V.

A vessel shall be deemed to be a native vessel if she is either owned, fitted out or commanded by a native of any country bordering on the Indian Ocean west of the meridian of 95° east of Greenwich and north of the parallel of 11° south latitude, the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, or the Gulf of Oman, or if at least one-half of the crew are natives of such countries.

The provisions of paragraph 1 hereof do not apply to lighters or barges or to vessels engaged exclusively in the coasting trade between different ports of the same State, colony, protectorate or mandated territory where warehouses are situated. The conditions under which articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V may be carried by such vessels are laid down in § 1 of Section II, of Annex II of the present Convention, to which the High Contracting Parties undertake to conform.

The provisions of this Article and of Section II, § 1, of Annex II do not apply:

(a) To arms, ammunition or implements carried on behalf of a Government either under an authorisation or accompanied by a duty authorised official of such Government; or

(b) To arms and ammunition in the possession of persons provided with a licence to carry arms on the condition that such arms are for the personal use of the bearer and are accurately described in such licence.

ARTICLE 21

The High Contracting Parties agree that, with the object of preventing all illicit conveyance within the special zones of articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V, all native vessels within the meaning of Article 20 must carry a manifest of their cargo or a similar document specifying the quantities and nature of the goods on board, their origin and destination. This manifest shall remain covered by the secrecy to which it is entitled by the law of the State to which the vessel belongs, and must not be examined during proceedings for the verification of the flag, unless the interested party consents thereto.

The provisions of this Article shall not apply to:

(a) Vessels exclusively engaged in the coasting trade between different ports of the same State, colony, protectorate or mandated territory; or

(b) Vessels engaged in carrying arms, ammunition and implements on behalf of a Government under the conditions defined in Article 20 (a) and proceeding to or from any point within the said zones; or

(c) Vessels only partially decked, having a maximum crew of ten men, and exclusively employed in fishing within territorial waters.

ARTICLE 22

The High Contracting Parties agree that no authorisation to fly the flag of any of such High Contracting Parties shall be granted to native vessels of less than 500 tons (net tonnage) as defined in Article 20, except in accordance with the conditions prescribed in Section II, §§ 3 and 4, of Annex II of the present Convention. Such authorisation, which shall be in writing, shall be renewed every year and shall contain the particulars necessary to identify the vessel, the name, tonnage, type of rigging, principal dimensions, registered number and signal letters if any. It shall bear the date on which it was granted and the status of the official who granted it.

ARTICLE 23

The High Contracting Parties agree to communicate to any other High Contracting Party who so requests the forms of the documents to be issued by them under Articles 20 (a), 21 and 22 and Section II, § 1, of Annex II of the present Convention.

The High Contracting Parties further agree to take all necessary measures to ensure that the following documents shall be supplied as soon as possible to any other High Contracting Party who has requested the same:

(a) Certified copies of all authorisations to fly the flag granted under the provisions of Article 22;

(b) Notice of the withdrawal of such authorisations;

(c) Copies of authorisations issued under Section II, § 1, of Annex II.

ARTICLE 24

The High Contracting Parties agree to apply in the maritime zone the regulations laid down in Annex II, Section II, § 5, of the present Convention.

ARTICLE 25

The High Contracting Parties agree that any illicit conveyance or attempted conveyance legally established against the captain or owner of a vessel authorised to fly the flag of one of the High Contracting Parties, or holding the licence provided for in Section II, § 1, of Annex II, of the present Convention, shall entail the immediate withdrawal of the said authorisation or licence.

ARTICLE 26

The High Contracting Parties who have under their sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage territory situated within the special zones, undertake, so far as each is concerned, to take the necessary measures to ensure the application of the present Convention and, in particular, the prosecution and punishment of offences against the provisions thereof, and to appoint the territorial and consular officers or competent special representatives for the purpose.

They will communicate these measures to such High Contracting Parties as shall have expressed the desire to be informed thereof.

ARTICLE 27

The High Contracting Parties agree that the provisions of Articles 16 to 26 inclusive and of Annex II of the present Convention establishing a certain regime of supervision in the special zones shall not be interpreted, as regards such High Contracting Parties as have no territory under their sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage within or immediately adjacent to the said special zones, either as constituting an obligation to apply the regime defined in the above-mentioned provisions or as involving their responsibility with respect to the application of this regime.

However, the said High Contracting Parties shall conform to the provisions of Articles 22, 23 and 25, which relate to the conditions under which native vessels under 500 tons (net tonnage) may be authorised to fly the flag of such High Contracting Parties.

CHAPTER IV. SPECIAL PROVISIONS

ARTICLE 28

Abyssinia, desirous of rendering as effective as possible the supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition and in implements of war, which is the subject of the present Convention, hereby undertakes, in the free exercise of her sovereign rights, to put into force, so far as concerns her own territory, all regulations which may be necessary to fulfil the provisions of Articles 12 to 18 inclusive of the said Convention relating to exports, imports and the transport of arms, ammunition and implements of war.

The High Contracting Parties take note of the above undertaking, and, being in full sympathy with the desire of Abyssinia to render as effective as possible the supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition and in implements of war, hereby undertake to conform to the provisions of the above-mentioned Articles so far as concerns Abyssinian territory, and to respect the regulations put into force, in accordance with the said undertaking, by Abyssinia as a sovereign State.

If a State, at present included in the special zones, should at the moment of its accession to the present Convention assume with respect to its own territory the same undertakings as those set forth in the first paragraph of this Article, and also, when such State possesses a sea coast, those contained in Articles 19 to 26 inclusive in so far as the same are applicable, the High Contracting Parties hereby declare that they will consider such State as excluded from the said zones from the date that its accession becomes effective as specified in Article 41 and that they will accept as regards such State the obligations set forth in the second paragraph of the present Article, and also, when the State excluded possesses a sea coast, the obligations of Articles 19 to 27 inclusive in so far as they are applicable.

ARTICLE 29

The High Contracting Parties agree to accept reservations which may be made by Esthonia, Finland, Latvia, Poland and Roumania at the moment of their signature of the present Convention and which shall suspend in respect of these States, until the accession of Russia to the present Convention, the application of Articles 6 and 9, as regards both export to and import into these countries by the High Contracting Parties. These reservations shall not be interpreted as preventing the publication of statistics in accordance with the laws and regulations in effect within the territory of any High Contracting Party.

ARTICLE 30

The High Contracting Parties who possess extra-territorial jurisdiction in the territory of another State party to the present Convention undertake in cases where the rules of this Convention cannot be enforced by the local courts as regards their nationals in such territory to prohibit all action by such nationals contrary to the provisions of the present Convention.

CHAPTER V. GENERAL PROVISIONS

ARTICLE 31

The provisions of the present Convention are completed by those of Annexes I and II, which have the same value and shall enter into force at the same time as the Convention itself.

ARTICLE 32

The High Contracting Parties agree that the provisions of the present Convention do not apply:

(a) To arms or ammuntion or to implements of war forwarded from territory under the sovereignty, jurisdiction, protection or tutelage of a High Contracting Party for the use of the armed forces of such High Contracting Party, wherever situated, nor

(b) To arms or ammunition carried by individual members of such forces or by other persons in the service of a High Contracting Party and required by them by reason of their calling, nor

(c) To rifles, muskets, carbines and the necessary ammunition therefor, carried by members of rifle clubs for the sole purpose of individual use in international competitions in marksmanship.

ARTICLE 33

In time of war, and without prejudice to the rules of neutrality, the provisions of Chapter II shall be suspended from operation until the restoration of peace so far as concerns any consignment of arms or ammunition or of implements of war to or on behalf of a belligerent.

ARTICLE 34

All the provisions of general international Conventions anterior to the date of the present Convention, such as the Convention for the Control of the Trade in Arms and Ammunition and the Protocol signed at St. Germain-en-Laye on September 10th, 1919, shall be considered as abrogated insofar as they relate to the matters dealt with in the present Convention and are binding between the Powers which are Parties to the present Convention.

The present Convention shall not be deemed to affect any rights and obligations which may arise out of the provisions either of the Covenant of the League of Nations or of the Treaties of Peace signed in 1919 and 1920 at Versailles, Neuilly, St. Germain and Trianon, or of the Treaty Limiting Naval Armaments signed at Washington on February 6th, 1922, or of any other treaty, convention, agreement or engagement concerning prohibition of import, export or transit of arms or ammunition or of implements of war; nor, without prejudice to the provisions of the present Convention itself, shall it affect any other treaty, convention, agreement or engagement other than those referred to in paragraph 1 of the present Article having as its object the supervision of import, export or transit of arms or ammunition or of implements of war.

ARTICLE 35

The High Contracting Parties agree that disputes arising between them relating to the interpretation or application of this Convention shall, if they cannot be settled by direct negotiation, be referred for decision to the Permanent Court of International Justice. In case either or both of the States to such a dispute should not be parties to the Protocol of December 16th, 1920, relating to the Permanent Court of International Justice, the dispute shall be referred, at the choice of the Parties and in accordance with the constitutional procedure of each State, either to the Permanent Court of International Justice or to a court of arbitration constituted in accordance with the Hague Convention of October 18th, 1907, or to some other court of arbitration.

ARTICLE 36

Any High Contracting Party may declare that its signature or ratification or accession does not, as regards the application of the provisions of Chapter II and of Articles 13, 14 and 15 of the present Convention, bind either all or any one of the territories subject to its sovereignty, jurisdiction or protection, provided that such territories are not situated in the special zones as defined in Article 12.

Any High Contracting Party which has made such a declaration may, subsequently, and in conformity with the provisions of Article 37, adhere entirely to the present Convention for any territories so excluded. Such High Contracting Party will use its best endeavours to ensure as soon as possible the accession of any territories so excluded.

Any High Contracting Party may also, as regards the application of the provisions of Chapter II and of Articles 13, 14 and 15 of the present Convention, and in conformity with the procedure laid down in Article 38, denounce the present Convention separately in respect of any territory referred to above.

Any High Contracting Party which shall have availed itself of the option of exclusion or of denunciation provided for in the preceding paragraphs undertakes to apply the provisions of Chapter II to consignments destined for territories in respect of which the option has been exercised.

ARTICLE 37

The High Contracting Parties will use their best endeavours to secure the accession to the present Convention of other States.

Each accession will be notified to the Government of the French Republic and by the latter to all the signatory or acceding States.

The instruments of accession shall remain deposited in the archives of the Government of the French Republic.

ARTICLE 38

The present Convention may be denounced by any High Contracting Party thereto after the expiration of four years from the date when it came into force in respect of that Party. Denunciation shall be effected by notification in writing addressed to the Government of the French Republic, which will forthwith transmit copies of such notification to the other Contracting Parties, informing them of the date on which it was received.

A denunciation shall take effect one year after the date of the receipt of the notification thereof by the Government of the French Republic and shall operate only in respect of the notifying State.

In case a denunciation has the effect of reducing the number of States parties to the Convention below fourteen, any of the remaining High Contracting Parties may also, within a period of one year from the date of such denunciation, denounce the Convention without waiting for the expiration of the period of four years mentioned above and may require that its denunciation shall take effect at the same date as the first-mentioned denunciation.

ARTICLE 39

The High Contracting Parties agree that, at the conclusion of a period of three years from the coming into force of the present Convention under the terms of Article 41, this Convention shall be subject to revision upon the request of one-third of the said High Contracting Parties addressed to the Government of the French Republic.

ARTICLE 40

The present Convention, of which the French and English texts are both authentic, is subject to ratification. It shall bear to-day's date.

Each Power shall address its ratification to the Government of the French Republic, which will at once notify the deposit of ratification to each of the other signatory Powers.

The instruments of ratification will remain deposited in the archives of the Government of the French Republic.

ARTICLE 41

A first proces-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up by the Government of the French Republic as soon as the present Convention shall have been ratified by fourteen Powers.

The Convention shall come into force four months after the date of the notification of this procès-verbal by the Government of the French Republic to all signatory Powers.

Subsequently, the Convention will come into force in respect of each High Contracting Party four months after the date on which its ratification or accession shall have been notified by the Government of the French Republic to all signatory or acceding States.

In witness whereof, the above-mentioned Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

[1] The imports included in this table shall be the general imports of arms and ammunition and of implements of war set out in the attached schedule, arriving from abroad, i. e., the total of the goods imported for home consumption, into warehouse, free zones, free ports, and all other places excluded from the Custom-territory, also temporary imports, improvement trade, etc., but excluding goods for transit or transshipment.

When temporary warehousing pending transit or transshipment is permitted, arms and ammunition and implements of war arriving under these conditions shall not be considered as imports, provided that the consignments are accompanied by a license or similar document mentioned in Article 4 of the present Convention showing some other country as destination.

[2] Arms and ammunition and implements of war covered by Category I shall be tabled separately from those in Category II.

[3] Name of country which issued the licence or similar document mentioned in Article 4 of the present Convention. But when the goods come from a Colony or Dependency, not issuing licences in its own name, but having an autonomous Customs system, such colony or dependency shall be shown as the country of origin.

[4] In legal currency of the importing country. In cases where the values are the result of conversion on a gold standard basis, this fact should be expressly mentioned in the heading of this column. In all cases the value shall be shown, except in the case of samples referred to in Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention when it is not obligatory.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

[1] The exports and re-exports included in this table shall be the general exports and re-exports of arms and ammunition and implements of war set out in the attached schedule leaving for abroad, i.e., the total of the goods exported and re-exported from the internal market from warehouse, free zones, free ports, and all other places excluded from the Customs territory, also temporary exports and re-exports, improvement trade, etc., but excluding goods for transit or transshipment.

When temporary warehousing pending transit or transshipment is permitted, the arms and ammunition and implements of war arriving under these conditions shall not be considered as imports provided that the consignments are accompanied by a license or similar document mentioned in Article 4 of the present Convention showing some other country as destination.

[2] Arms and ammunition and implements of war covered by Category I shall be tabled separately from those in Category II.

[3] Country in whose favour the license or similar document mentioned in Article 4 of the present Convention has been issued. In the case of an application by a mother-country on behalf of a Colony or Dependency having an autonomous Customs regime, such Colony or Dependency should be shown as country of destination.

[4] In legal currency of the exporting country. In cases where the values are the result of conversion on a gold standard basis, this fact should be expressly mentioned in the title of this column. In all cases value shall be shown, except in the case of samples referred to in Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention when it is not obligatory.

SCHEDULE

CATEGORY I. ARMS, AMMUNITION AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR EXCLUSIVELY DESIGNED AND INTENDED FOR LAND, SEA OR AERIAL WARFARE

Arms and ammunition and implements exclusively designed and intended for land, sea or aerial warfare, which are, or shall be, comprised in the armament of the armed forces of any State, or which, if they have been, are no longer comprised in such armament but are capable of military to the exclusion of any other use, except such arms, ammunition and implements which, though included in the above definition, are covered in other categories.

Such arms, ammunition and implements are comprised in the following twelve headings:

1. Rifles, muskets, carbines (number).

2. (a) Machine-guns, automatic rifles and machine-pistols of all calibres (number);

(b) Mountings for machine-guns (number);

(c) Interrupter gears (number).

3. Projectiles and ammunition for the arms enumerated in Nos. 1 and 2 above (number).

4. Gun-sighting apparatus including aerial gun-sights and bomb-sights, and fire-control apparatus (number).

5. (a) Cannon, long or short, and howitzers, of a calibre less than 5.9 inches (15 cm.) (number);

(b) Cannon, long or short, and howitzers, of a calibre of 5.9 inches (15 cm.) or above (number);

(c) Mortars of all kinds (number);

(d) Gun carriages (number), mountings (number), recuperators (number), accessories for mountings (weight).

6. Projectiles and ammunition for the arms enumerated in No. 5 above (number).

7. Apparatus for the discharge of bombs, torpedoes, depth charges and other kinds of projectiles (number).

8. (a) Grenades (number);

(b) Bombs (number);

(c) Land mines, submarine mines, fixed or floating, depth charges (number);

(d) Torpedoes (number).

9. Appliances for use with the above arms and apparatus (number).

10. Bayonets (number).

11. Tanks and armoured cars (number).

12. Arms and ammunition not specified in the above enumeration (number or weight).

Component parts, completely finished, of the articles covered by the above headings, if capable of being utilized only in the assembly or repair of the said articles, or as spare parts, should be entered separately, by weight, under each of the above headings or subheadings to which they belong.

CATEGORY II. ARMS AND AMMUNITION CAPABLE OF USE BOTH FOR MILITARY AND OTHER PURPOSES

1. Pistols and revolvers, automatic or self-loading, and developments of the same, designed for single-handed use or fired from the shoulder, of a calibre greater than 6.5 mm. and length of barrel greater than 10 cm. (number).

2. Fire-arms designed, intended or adapted for non-military purposes, such as sport or personal defence, that will fire cartridges that can be fired from fire-arms in Category I. Other rifled fire-arms, firing from the shoulder of a calibre of 6 mm. or above not included in Category I, with the exception of rifled fire-arms with a "break-down" action (number).

3. Ammunition for the arms enumerated in the above two headings, with the exception of ammunition covered by Category I (number).

4. Swords and lances (number).

Component parts, completely finished, of the articles covered by the above headings, if capable of being utilised only in the assembly or repair of the said articles, or as spare parts, should be entered separately, by weight, under each of the above headings or sub-headings to which they belong.

ANNEX II

SUPERVISION WITHIN THE SPECIAL ZONES

Section 1. Supervision on Land

All articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V admitted into the territory of a State, colony, protectorate or mandated territory situated in the special zones, except such articles imported by individuals for their personal use under an authorisation issued by the authorities of the territory concerned, shall be deposited by the importer at his own expense and risk in a public warehouse maintained under the exclusive custody and permanent supervision of the authorities aforesaid or their officials, of whom at least one must be a member of their armed forces, and who shall keep an official record of such deposit.

Every withdrawal from a public warehouse must be authorised beforehand by such authorities. No such authorisation shall be given except for the purposes of transfer to another public warehouse or to a private warehouse duly approved by the said authorities or for delivery to individuals who have proved to the satisfaction of the said authorities that the articles are necessary to them for their personal use.

Articles required for the equipment of the national forces or for the defence of the territory are exempted from all formalities in connection with deposit in or withdrawal from a public warehouse.

No private warehouse for articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V shall be allowed within the special zones unless authorised by the authorities of the State, colony, protectorate or mandated territory. Such warehouse must consist of enclosed premises, reserved for that purpose and having only one entry, which must be fitted with two locks, one of which can be opened only by officials of the authorities.

The person in charge of the warehouse shall be responsible for all such articles deposited therein and must account for them on demand by the authorities.

Such articles must not be withdrawn from the warehouse nor be transported or transferred without a special authorisation. The particulars entered on such authorisations shall be noted in a special register numbered and initialled.

Every arm imported under the provisions of § 1 by an individual for his personal use or transferred under the provisions of the same § from a public warehouse to a private warehouse or a private individual must be registered. A mark shall be stamped thereon if it does not already bear another mark or a number sufficient for identification. The mark or number shall be noted in the licence to carry arms issued by the authorities.

The manufacture or assembly within the special zones of articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V is prohibited otherwise than in establishments instituted for the defence of the territory or maintenance of public order by the authorities of the territory concerned, or in the case of mandated territory by such authorities under the supervision of the mandatory Power.

The repair of such articles shall only be carried out in establishments instituted by the authorities or in private establishments which shall have been authorised for this purpose by the said authorities. Such authorisation shall not be granted without guarantees for the observance of the rules of the present Convention.

Section II. Maritime supervision

Cargoes of articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V shipped on board the lighters, barges or coasting vessels referred to in Article 20, paragraph 3, must be covered by a special licence issued by the authorities of the State, colony, protectorate or mandated territory in which such cargoes are shipped, and containing the particulars specified in § 2 hereof. All articles so shipped shall in addition be subject to the provisions of the present Convention.

Special licences referred to in § 1 of Section II of the present Annex shall contain the following particulars:

(a) A statement of the nature and quantity of the articles in respect of which the licence is issued.

(b) The name of the vessel on which the cargoes are to be shipped.

(c) The name of the ultimate consignee.

(d) The ports of loading and discharge.

It shall be certified on such licences that they have been issued in conformity with the provisions of the present Convention.

An authorisation to fly the flag of a High Contracting Party may only be granted by the authorities mentioned in paragraph (b) below, and subject to the three following conditions:

(a) The owners must be nationals of the Power whose flag they claim to fly or companies who are nationals under the laws of that Power.

(b) The owners must have furnished proof that they are bona fide owners of real estate in the territory of the authorities to whom the application for a license is addressed, or have given to such authorities sufficient guarantees for the payment of any fines to which they may become liable.

(c) The owners and the captain of the vessel must have furnished proof that they enjoy a good reputation and, in particular, that they have never been convicted of illicit conveyance of arms or ammunition or implements of war.

All native vessels before they are authorized to fly the flag of a High Contracting Party shall have complied with the following regulations for the purpose of their identification at sea:

(a) The initial letters of the port of registration of the native vessel, followed by the vessel's registration number in the serial port numbers, must be incised and painted in white on black ground on both quarters of each vessel in such a position as to be easily distinguishable from a distance.

(b) The net tonnage of the native vessel shall also, if practicable, be incised and painted inside the hull in a conspicuous position.

The regulations referred to in Article 24 of the present Convention are as follows:

1. When a warship belonging to one of the High Contracting Parties encounters within the maritime zone but outside territorial waters a presumed native vessel of under 500 tons burden (net tonnage),

(a) Flying the flag of one of the High Contracting Parties, or

(b) Flying no flag, and the Commanding Officer of the warship has good reason to believe that the said vessel is flying the flag of any High Contracting Party without being entitled to do so, or is illicitly conveying articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V, he may proceed to stop the vessel in order to verify the nationality of the vessel by examining the document authorising the flying of the flag, but no other document.

2. Any vessel which presents the appearance of native build and rig may be presumed to be a native vessel.

3. For the purpose of verifying the nationality of the suspected vessel, a boat commanded by a commissioned officer in uniform may be sent to visit the vessel after she has been hailed so as to give notice of such intention. The officer sent on board the vessel shall act with all possible consideration and moderation. Before leaving the vessel, the officer shall draw up a proces-verbal in the form and language in use in his own country. This proces-verbal shall state the facts of the case and shall be dated and signed by the officer.

Should there be on board the warship no commissioned officer other than the Commanding Officer, the above prescribed operations may be carried out by a warrant, petty or non-commissioned officer at the discretion of the Commanding Officer.

The captain or master of the vessel visited, as well as the witnesses, shall be invited to sign the proces-verbal and shall have the right to add to it any explanations which they may consider expedient.

4. In the cases referred to in paragraph 1 (a) hereof, unless the right to fly the flag can be established, the vessel may be conducted to the nearest port in the maritime zone where there is a competent authority of the Power whose flag has been flown and shall be handed over to such authority, but if such a port should be at such a distance from the point of detention that the warship would have to leave her station or patrol to escort the detained vessel thereto, the vessel may be taken to the nearest port where there is a competent authority of one of the High Contracting Parties of nationality other than that of the warship and handed over to such authority, and steps shall at once be taken to notify this fact to the competent authority representing the power concerned.

No proceeding shall be taken against the vessel or her crew until the arrival of the representative of the Power whose flag the vessel was flying or without authority from such representative.

Instead of conducting the suspected vessel to a port as laid down above, the Commanding Officer of the detaining warship may hand her over to a warship of the nation whose flag she has flown if the latter consents to take charge of her.

5. The procedure laid down in paragraph 4 may also be followed if, after the verification of the flag and in spite of the voluntary production of the manifest, the Commanding Officer of the warship continues to suspect the vessel of engaging in the illicit conveyance of articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V.

6. In the cases referred to in paragraph 1 (b) hereof, if it is ascertained, as a result of the visit made on board the vessel that, whereas it flew no flag, it was also not entitled to fly the flag of a recognised State, the vessel may, unless the innocent nature of her cargo can be duly established to the satisfaction of the Commanding Officer of the warship, be conducted to the nearest point in the maritime zone where there is a competent authority of the Power to which the detaining warship belongs, and shall be handed over to such authority.

7. The authority before whom the suspected vessel has been brought shall institute a full enquiry in accordance with the laws and regulations of his country and in conformity with the procedure laid down in paragraph 8 below.

This enquiry shall be carried out in the presence of an officer of the detaining warship.

If, however, the presence of such officer is impracticable owing to the duties upon which the warship is engaged, an affidavit sworn by the Commanding Officer may in special cases be accepted by the authority holding the enquiry in place of the oral evidence of an officer of the warship.

8. (a) In the case of vessels referred to in paragraph 1 (a) above, if it is proved at this enquiry that the flag has been illegally flown, but that the vessel is entitled to fly the flag of a recognised State, she shall, if that State is one of the High Contracting Parties, be handed over to the nearest authority of that State. If such State is not a High Contracting Party, the vessel shall be disposed of by agreement between the State responsible for her detention and the State whose flag she is entitled to fly, and, pending such agreement, shall remain in the custody of the authorities of the nationality of the detaining warship.

(b) If it should be established that the use of the flag by the detained vessel was correct, but that the vessel was engaged in the illicit conveyance of articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V, those responsible shall be brought before the courts of the State under whose flag the vessel sailed. The vessel herself and her cargo shall remain in charge of the authority conducting the enquiry. The illicit cargo may be destroyed in accordance with laws and regulations drawn up for the purpose.

(c) In the case of vessels referred to in paragraph 1 (b) above, if it be established that the vessel had the right to fly the flag of one of the High Contracting Parties but was engaged in the illicit conveyance of any of the articles covered by Categories I, II, IV, and V, the procedure laid down in the preceding paragraph should be followed.

(d) In the case of vessels referred to in paragraph 1 (b) above, if it be established that the vessel was not entitled to fly the flag of any of the High Contracting Parties and was engaged in the illicit conveyance of any of the articles covered by Categories I, II, IV and V, the vessel and all cargo carried in addition to these articles shall be seized by such authorities and disposed of according to the national laws and regulations of the authorities before whom the vessel has been brought. The destruction of this cargo may be ordered according to the same laws and regulations.

(e) If the authority entrusted with the enquiry decides that the detention and diversion of the vessel or other measures imposed upon her were irregular, he shall assess the amount of the compensation which he considers to be due.

9. If the decision and assessment of the said authority are accepted by the detaining officer and the authorities to whom he is subject, the amount awarded shall be paid within six months from the date of the said assessment.

10. If the detaining officer, or the authorities to whom he is subject, contest the decision or the amount of the compensation assessed, the dispute shall be submitted to a Court of Arbitration consisting of one arbitrator appointed by the Government whose flag the vessel was flying, one appointed by the Government of the detaining officer, and an umpire chosen by the two arbitrators thus appointed. The two arbitrators shall be chosen, as far as possible, from among the Diplomatic, Consular or Judicial officers of the High Contracting Parties. These appointments must be made with the least possible delay. Any compensation awarded shall be paid to the persons concerned within six months at most from the date of the award of the court.

11. The Commanding Officer of a warship who may have stopped a vessel flying a foreign flag shall in all cases make a report thereon to his Government, stating the grounds on which he acted. An extract from this report, together with a copy of the proces-verbal, drawn up by the officer, warrant officer, petty or non-commissioned officer sent on board the vessel detained, shall be sent as soon as possible to the Government whose flag the detained vessel was flying and to such of the High Contracting Parties as may have expressed the desire to receive such documents.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS in the chair), as in executive session, laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

RECIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk proceed with the readnig of the bill.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Coolidge	Hatch	Patterson	Walsh
Copeland	Hayden	Pittman	Wheeler
Costigan	Johnson	Pope	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

FILING THE SWORD'S DULL SIDE

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am sorry there are not more of our Democrats here this afternoon. I have taken the pains to collect some of the promises made by the Democrats to the American people, and I am going to undertake to remind Democratic Senators of the promises that have been made up to the last few months. I do not want the Democrats to violate their word, which is still resting with the dew on it that has not yet disappeared. In other words, I should at least like to have a little more time pass before the Democrats break their word which they gave to the American people.

When the flexible-tariff provision was written into the law there were four Democrats in this body who were in favor of it. Two of them came from Louisiana. I led the fight and made it an issue in our State that both the Democrats from Louisiana who had voted for the flexible-tariff provision should be taken out of the United States Senate. I did it on the command of my party. I did it on the word of my party that the Democratic Senators from our State, who voted to take the taxing power out of the Congress and put it in the hands of the President of the United States, had violated their pledge and their oath to the American people and that they ought to be taken out of the United States Senate. Former Senator Ransdell and former Senator Broussard today are the victims of the decree of the Democrats who voted on this side of the Chamber that they were not fit on the basis of that principle to sit here and legislate for the people.

It was an issue in the State of Louisiana. Both those men who sat here were as honorable men, I suppose, as ever sat in the United States Senate, but they voted to take the taxing power, under the flexible provision of the tariff law, out of the hands of the Congress and put it into the hands of the President of the United States. Both those men were retired from the United States Senate because the Democratic Party was deserted in its hour when it was undertaking to serve the people along the lines of constitutional and valid congressional enactment.

I was asked in the campaign, when I ran against my illustrious predecessor in this body, whether or not I would stand for a tariff bill, if it protected sugar, regardless of what it might contain otherwise. I specifically answered to the people of my State that I would not countenance that kind of a measure even though it did protect sugar and other products of the State of Louisiana under a protective tariff.

Now we have come here after these two illustrious men have been defeated and removed from the United States Senate, and after the defeat of another of the four Democratic Senators who voted for that provision, after three out of the four have been retired from this body and after our party has gone on record on the question, to decide whether, instead of keeping the promise of the party to repeal what had already been enacted, we shall double the menace and make it a twofold wrong, instead of undoing what we promised the people we would undo.

Mr. President, I am going to read a few lines from the promises of the Democratic Party. It does not seem to me out of order that the words of some men should be read to them seriously. I do not understand the theory of government that a man's campaign promises mean nothing. I do not understand the theory of government by which a party's campaign promises mean nothing. I have said before on the floor of the Senate that a traitor in the Army is hanged, and I say now on the floor of the Senate that a party that is a traitor deserves a similar fate. Whether it is the Democratic Party or the Republican Party or any other party, when its word recently given is at cross purposes with what is now proposed to be done, I conceive it to be the duty of that party and of that party's organization to maintain its pledges given to the American people.

First, I am going to read from the Democratic platform of 1932. My friend the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], sitting near me at this moment, helped to write this platform. I helped to write it. Many others of us helped to write it. My colleague from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] was in the convention where the platform was adopted. I am going to read from that platform. It may not mean anything; but if we do not keep our platform pledges this time it may mean that the people will never trust the Democratic Party on another platform. I well recall the words of a former Senator from Iowa, who reminded the Republican Party in 1909 that if it broke its word, the promise which the Republican Party had given the people of the United States in the year 1908, it might mean disaster to that party. The words of Senator Dolliver rang through the country, and his prophecy was fulfilled.

Now we are here on the other side of the Chamber considering the matter which is now before the Senate, and I am going to read the even more specific words of our own party. Just before I read them let me say that I do not care how we may look upon the tariff. I am a tariff Democrat, but as a tariff Democrat I refused to sanction the bargaining away of the legislative power in the year 1930. I refused to do it in the year 1932, even though it did contain protection for the products of the State of Louisiana. I am arguing now that, even though there were no promise of the party, I could not stand for the bargaining and trading away of the power of Congress entrusted to its hands, and the placing of that power in other hands.

Let me read from our party platform the Democratic tariff plank of 1932, as follows:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding Tariff Commission free from Executive interference.

Free from Executive interference. We advocated a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding Tariff Commission free from interference by the President of the United States. Yet we come here now and propose not only to transgress that promise of the party, we come here and not only propose that the Commission shall not be free from Executive influence, but we propose to put full power into the hands of the President of the United States, when we have gone before the American people and said to them that this taxing authority should be free from the influence of the Executive.

Does somebody mean to tell me that we are purporting, topside or bottom, to keep the word of the party with the kind of iniquitous legislation that is now pending here?

I will read further. We are told that we are going to make reciprocal-tariff agreements. Why, this very thing was covered by this plank, Mr. President. We not only said that we favored a tariff free from Executive interference, but we said that we favored reciprocal-tariff agreements free from the same Executive interference. I will read the whole plank:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding Tariff Commission free from Executive interference, reciprocal-tariff agreements with other nations, and an international economic conference designed to restore international trade and facilitate exchange.

How was that interpreted? It was interpreted by such men as the candidate for President of the United States on the Democratic Party platform. Let us see how he interpreted this matter, just in order that we may read some of the provisions.

Perhaps it would be better if I should first read the interpretation given by the gentleman put forward as our leading Democratic authority, the present Secretary of State, the gentleman through whose hands are to be made these reciprocal-tariff agreements. I will first read the interpretation, the promise, the pledge, the guaranty given to the people of the United States through its spokesman, now designated as the man who is to negotiate these reciprocal agreements. Let me read what was said by Mr. Cordell Hull on the 19th day of May 1932.

Does this mean anything, my friends? Listen as I read it to you. Here is the pledge of the Democratic Party, backed by its platform, backed by its record, backed by its declarations. I now read the words of the Secretary of State on May 19, 1932:

> I am unalterably opposed to section 315 of the tariff act and demand its speedy repeal.

Section 315 is the provision of the law which allows the President of the United States to vary the tariffs fixed by Congress not to exceed 50 percent upon the fact being found by the Tariff Commission that the cost of producing those commodities in foreign countries shows that much difference from the cost of producing the same commodities in this country. In other words, section 315 does not to the remotest extent tend to give to the President of the United States any such extensive authority as the proposal now before the Senate; but said Mr. Hull:

> I * * * demand its speedy repeal.

That is, he demanded the speedy repeal of such flimsy authority as then existed in comparison with what is now proposed.

Said Mr. Hull further:

> I strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party, which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision—

Imagine, my friends, Mr. Hull, who has since been appointed Secretary of State, standing before the American people speaking for the Democratic Party, condemning the Republican Party because it stood for the retention and the enhancement or the enlargement of the powers contained in the flexible tariff law, and yet after having told the American people that he demanded the repeal of that unconstitutional variety of Executive power, after having said that he condemned the party that undertook to retain it or that would undertake to expand it, he comes here now and asks the Democratic Party to break its word, given to the men and women and children of this country, and enlarge the very thing that he said should be repealed.

Let me read further from Mr. Hull:

> I strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party, which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision, with such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution—a vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic King.

We went before the American people and said that such a thing as is proposed here, or half the thing that is proposed here, was a greater power than the taxing power that was wrenched by the House of Commons from His Britannic Majesty. We said that instead of allowing this thing to be enlarged and expanded, we promised to restore a democratic government to the people, and to undo what had already been done; and yet the same man who said those things on our behalf now wants us to come in here and eat our words, and eat his words, and eat up the party platform, and throw the Constitution into the scrap-heap, and consign it to the demnition bowwows, so that no traveler will ever be able to recall it to memory, and not only give to the Executive and take away from Congress powers which were said to be twice as great as those which were wrenched by the House of Commons from the King of Great Britain, but confer upon the Executive powers which transcend and go beyond what was ever contemplated even by the Republican Party, or by the most monarchistic advocate that this country has ever seen in American politics.

Let me read a little bit further about the monstrosity that is attempted here. It is an outrage on this country. It is a perjury against truth. It is one of the most brazen efforts to perpetrate a fraud, contrary to what has been promised to the people of this country by a party that has been placed in office, that I have ever witnessed since I have been old enough to observe politics in this country. If I were faced today with such a declaration as I have read here, and I were faced today with undertaking not only to do what I had condemned but to double, treble, and quadruple such power, I would resign my seat in the Senate so quickly that the ink would not be dry on my resignation before I would walk out of this Chamber.

I can quit public life when I dishonor my promises in that way. It does not mean enough to me. Never has a public office meant so much to me that I would perjure the word that I gave to the American people before the snow had fallen in the following season. Never would I go before the American people with that kind of perjury in my teeth; and yet that is what we are doing. I should just like to see the color of the eyes of the man who would say that we are not doing it. I should just like to see one of the men I am quoting who would say that anything I am reading here is not his own words.

I will read a little bit further from the words of the Secretary of State:

> The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible tariff law is astonishing—
>
> Said Mr. Cordell Hull—
> is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, I am not reading from something that was said away back yonder, at the time the flexible tariff bill was passed. I am reading from this man's words on the 19th day of May 1932, immediately preceding the time when he was called into the resolutions committee of the Democratic Party to draft a plank in keeping with these pronouncements, immediately following which, after a successful election, he was called into the office of Secretary of State, and sits there today. He says:

> The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible-tariff clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of taxing power back to the head of a government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion: "This is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want."

I did not know yesterday that I was using the words of the illustrious Secretary of State of my party when I said that this was too much power for a good man to want; but I did say that there had been Presidents of the United States who had declined less power than this on the ground that it tended to destroy legislative government in this country and was a betrayal of the fundamental principles of the Constitution upon which this Government rested.

We had a few more words to the same effect along about that time or before that time. My distinguished colleague from the neighboring State of Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], now serving in this body, gave utterance to his views on this question. He was not looked upon as being the great authority on the tariff that the present Secretary of State was heralded to be; but, nevertheless, by reason of seniority, he held the ranking position for the Democratic Party on the Committee on Finance, which had to do with measures affecting revenue and tariffs; so he said to himself, and then got up and said to the country one morning bright and early or late at night, or at some other time, something about like this, on May 29, 1930:

No doubt President Hoover is happy today. No wonder we read in the papers that he is going to make a week-end trip into Pennsylvania. His heart is light. He is joyous now. He was hungry for more authority. He will have it now under this flexible tariff provision.

It is all wrong—

"It is all wrong", said this distinguished absentee [laughter]—

It is all wrong that such an opportunity as resides in this flexible-tariff provision should be afforded to any President of the United States. That statement applies, of course, to a Democratic President.

That sounds as though the speaker meant what he said. Let me read the last clause again:

It is all wrong that such an opportunity as resides in this flexible-tariff provision should be affordede to any President of the United States.

This is Brother HARRISON, of Mississippi, talking.

That statement applies, of course, to a Democratic President.

Does it? On the contrary, instead of the Senator who said that standing up here on his hind feet today and saying that "it is all wrong", instead of saying that this thing is wrong for a Democrat just the same as it is wrong for a Republican, Senators stand up here in an effort to keep section 315, known as the "flexible-tariff provision", a part of the law just as it was then, and to add to it the right to negotiate reciprocal tariff agreements and to fix tariffs by treaty to last 3 years beyond the time when the present President of the United States goes out of office, whether Congress wants to repeal them or not.

There is one thing that can be said for the Republicans, with all that they can be accused of—and God knows I have accused them of everything I could think of. There is one thing we can say for them: They never did fix a tariff so that it could not be repealed by an act of Congress at any time Congress wanted to do it. As badly as they may have acted there never had been one of these reciprocal-tariff agreements made that was not subject to the law-making power of this country. It is proposed today that we empower the President of the United States to enter into irrevocable treaties, slicing the tariffs of this country down to such a point as he wishes—and I use the word "wishes" advisedly—and that it shall remain in force for a period of 3 years, if he wants to make it a period of 3 years.

There is supposed to be some limitation. I have been an executive myself, governor of my State. It is said here that the President must be satisfied that there is a condition existing which justifies him in taking the action. It was said, when I went into office, that I must decide that every man I ousted from the highway commission was not efficient and that I was removing him for the good of the service.

I therefore was ready to remove all three of the members of that commission the day I went in and put in their places some men who had voted for me. That is what that provision meant. That is what the provision had meant to every Governor who had served ahead of me. That is what the provision has meant to the Governor of every other State in the United States I ever heard about. That is what such a provision would mean to anybody holding an executive position.

Where is the particular provision here that is supposed to cause the President to find out something before he acts? I have not even taken time to read it. I have heard it read. It is wasting that much paper to put it here.

Mr. BAILEY. It is in the tenth line, on page 2, of the bill.

Mr. LONG. The tenth line, on page 2. This is a great saving to the country:

Whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified.

Whenever he finds as a fact, in his own mind, that the existing tariff schedules are a burden to foreign commerce, he has a right to change them; that is all. What that means is that whenever the President thinks he ought to change them he can change them. Whenever the President thinks he wants to change them, that is when he ought to change them. Whatever a man thinks he wants to do is whatever a man thinks he ought to do nine hundred and ninety-nine and nine-tenths times out of a thousand, and that is what it means in this particular case.

Why not write another provision? I ask some of my constitutional lawyer friends who are here, why not write another provision, that whenever the President finds that foreign commerce is being restrained, and that national peril threatens, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to declare war, and to appropriate the funds necessary to carry on that war?

If we have the right to say that it is within the ipse dixit of anyone, be he President, Vice President, or anyone else, to invoke the taxing power and make a treaty with another country, we can provide just as easily and just as well and just as validly that he has a right to invoke the war-making power, and appropriate money in the United States Treasury, in order to protect this foreign trade, and in order to protect this country from national peril. No one will contradict the statement that that would be just as constitutional as is the proposed legislation.

I must pause before reading from Franklin D. Roosevelt himself, and pay my respects to the courts of this country, as well as to Congress. I have paid my respects to the Congress, and to myself included, for some of its activities, but never again will I raise my hand and say that the courts are the bulwark of constitutional government in the United States. No longer should it ever be written in the schoolboy histories of this country that the judiciary stands as a bulwark and safeguard of constitutional government in this country.

So long as courts were courageous enough to stand up and raise their hands against the onslaughts made against constitutional government, so long as they exercised the courage needed in such times as the present and in other crises in order to keep a balanced government and a legislative government functioning, so long did the courts deserve all praise. But it has reached such a point that, sitting among my friends the other night, I heard one of them say what I was unable to contradict, that "Never has a court held unconstitutional any power granted by the Congress to the President of the United States." Said he, "Whenever the Congress has abdicated, somehow or other, the Court has always upheld the action."

I must agree with the Senator from Idaho about the pronouncements I have read from the Supreme Court of the United States and from some of the circuit courts of the United States. They have destroyed the confidence I had thought I could always repose in those courts, that never would they allow a republican form of government to be sacrificed to the exigencies of power. But apparently, if this body is not willing to maintain its own prerogatives, if we are not willing to sustain the constitutional bulwark which we thought to be necessary against the varied modern theories of fascism, and communism, and Nazi-ism, and various and sundry other fictitious and transitory rules, apparently the Supreme Court will get itself out of the way and let the onrush be complete.

All that is left on the flimsy little ledge upon which we stand, to maintain constitutional government at all, all that persists in the form of congressional action, to levy taxes, to declare war, to continue as a government and do anything that needs to be done, to pass any law that may be necessary, all that is left of legislative action must be exercised by the Senate. The House has abdicated already, and we have abdicated about as fast as they have. Little remains.

Let us get back to our words, meaningless words, these meaningless promises made to the American people. Here is a great party, of great men, great statesmen, great Senators, standing before the American people saying, "Oh, we promised that. Oh, we said that. Oh, yes; we denounced it as being a riotous proposition from start to finish." We traveled the road from Dan to Beersheba and promised the people one thing, and now it is proposed that we come back, not with a single-edged sword which the party opposed to us had adopted, which we condemned, but we propose to sharpen the sword on the other side and slash at the people with a double-edged sword.

They have taken this flexible tariff sword, section 315, which was imbedded in the laws of this country, and instead of having taken that sword and broken it off at the handle and stabbed it into the ground so that it never again might cut against the constitutional process, we have filed off the other side of the sword, and now they propose to run amuck among the institutions of this country and destroy them with a two-edged sword.

Let us read the words. We have a Vice President, thank God. He had something to say about it. I will get up to the President in just a moment, just to show that there is no difference about it. Vice President Garner said:

> I want you all to turn over in your minds and see what it means for Congress, representing the people of America, to surrender its rights to levy taxes. Remember this, gentlemen, when the legislative body surrenders its tariff powers and obligations to the Executive.

"Remember this", he said, "what peril threatens this country when Congress surrenders its legislative powers in fixing tariffs into the hands of an Executive." So spoke the Speaker of the House, our candidate for Vice President of the United States.

What saith he now? Ah, Mr. President, the voice is as stilled as though it were lying underneath a sign painted upon a nickel plate, "At rest." It has become as though it were encased in something from which no sound could be emitted.

"Remember this", said he to the American people when we were trying to make him Vice President of the United States, and did—"Remember this", said he, "Turn over in your minds and see what it means for Congress, representing the people of America, to surrender its rights to levy taxes." Remember this, Senators, when the legislative body surrenders its tariff powers and obligations to the Executive.

When the people of the United States heard those words, and heard the promises made in the campaign and heard the party platform read from one end of this country to the other, and placed in power the men from whose pens and whose lips fell those promises to keep legislative government in the hands of Congress, and to keep the power of taxation heretofore usurped by kings whose heads fell as the result thereof, out of the hands of the Executive of this country, the people believed in and had faith in what was promised, the American people had faith in the Democratic Party. But the promises were made apparently only to be broken. And then what will the American people say? They will say: "We ought to have had sense enough not to pay any attention to the promise of the Democratic candidate for Vice President; we ought to have had sense enough", they will say "not to pay attention to the Democratic platform of 1932; we ought to have had sense enough to pay no attention to that Democratic legislator who has been made Secretary of State; we ought to have had sense enough not to listen to"—whom?—"to the present President of the United States." And now I will read his words.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Would it disturb the Senator if I asked him to hark back to the platform of the Democratic Party?

Mr. LONG. I have just read it.

Mr. STEIWER. It seems to me the Senator may be overlooking the fact that the President himself gave consideration to the platform. At the time he arrived at the Chicago convention, as I remember, he declared his adherence to that doctrine.

Mr. LONG. One hundred percent.

Mr. STEIWER. Will the Senator develop that fact?

Mr. LONG. Yes; I will.

Mr. STEIWER. It seems to me there is no declaration that a candidate could make which is more effectively a pledge to the people than asserting his allegiance to the party platform.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; we have something more important than that. Just before Mr. Roosevelt was nominated, we adopted this plank, and Mr. Roosevelt, as we all know, was nominated 2 days later, and arrived the next day and made a speech. When Mr. Roosevelt arrived at Chicago, among the first words which fell from his lips were, "I approve this platform 100 percent."

That platform read:

> We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding commission free from Executive interference—

And so forth. Subsequent thereto our candidate for President said, on September 30, 1932:

> What does the Democratic Party propose to do in the premises? The platform declares in favor of a competitive tariff which means one which will put the American producers on a market equality with their foreign competitors.

In other words, our platform had said that we would have a fact-finding commission free from Executive interference, and that fact-finding commission would determine the difference in cost of producing a commodity in England or Germany as compared with the cost of producing that commodity in America, and that thereupon a tariff would be levied sufficient to cover the difference in the cost of producing that commodity in a foreign land and in the United States, and our platform had said that that fact-finding commission should be free absolutely from Executive interference.

Said our President then:

> The platform declares in favor of a competitive tariff which means one which will put the American producers on a market equality with foreign competitors, one that equalizes the difference in the cost of production.

Listen to that. And now we have representatives of our party who come here and talk about going back on this pledge.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. Is there any part of that platform which has been carried out, to the Senator's recollection?

Mr. LONG. Yes; there is one part of it which has been carried out. In fact, there is more than one part of it which has been carried out. I will ask the Senator as to what he means by "carried out"? Does the Senator mean carried out in a barrel, or carried out in performance?

Mr. SCHALL. Carried out in operation.

Mr. LONG. The Senator will have to excuse me from answering that question now, because I am likely to be embarrassed in some campaign in the future if I answer such a question.

Mr. SCHALL. I have been unable to find a single part of the platform which it has even been attempted to carry out.

Mr. LONG. The Senator will have to excuse me from answering that question at this time. [Laughter.]

Our President said:

> The platform declares in favor of a competitive tariff, which means one which will put the American producers on a market equality with their foreign competitors—one that equalizes the difference in the cost of production—not a prohibitory tariff, back of which domestic producers may combine to practice extortion of the American public.
> But how is reduction to be accomplished? By international negotiation as the first and most desirable method, in view of present world conditions—by consenting to reduce to some extent some of our duties in order to secure a lowering of foreign walls that a larger measure of our surplus may be admitted abroad. * * *
> Next the Democrats proposed to accomplish the necessary reductions through the agency of the Tariff Commission.

In other words, said he, we will only accomplish a reciprocal agreement through a competitive tariff, through facts found by a commission showing the difference in the cost of producing that article in a foreign land and the cost of producing that article in this land. And no reciprocal tariff will be made except such as is strictly in accordance with the facts as found by this Tariff Commission, which shall operate entirely free from Executive interference.

That was the pledge of the party, I suppose. It had already been in the platform. But I am not yet through.

On November 4, 1932, 4 days before he was elected President of the United States, Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt said this to the American people:

I have sought during these months to emphasize a broad policy of construction, of national planning and of national building, constructed in harmony with the best traditions of the American system. I have concentrated of necessity upon the broad and immediately insistent problems of national scope. * * *

At Sioux City, Iowa, I proposed a tariff policy aimed to restore international trade and international commerce not only with this Nation but between all nations of the world.

So again did the President reaffirm that we would have only a competitive tariff, and when the differences of the costs between the two countries are ascertained, that only then would he undertake to make an international agreement carrying that into effect.

On October 20, 1932, 18 days before the election of November 8, Mr. Roosevelt said:

I have advocated a lowering of tariffs by negotiation with foreign countries. But I have not advocated, and I will never advocate, a tariff policy which will withdraw protection from American workers against those countries which employ cheap labor or who operate under a standard of living which is lower than that of our own great laboring groups.

Again was the President of the United States pledging himself that a fact-finding commission should find the difference in the cost of producing an article abroad and here, and would negotiate alone on that basis, and that the commission should be free from Executive interference in arriving at its findings.

On October 26, 1932—and now we are getting a little bit closer to home for me—Mr. Roosevelt made another statement. I will read the statement Mr. Roosevelt made on September 15, 1932, before I quote the statement of October 26. On September 15 he said:

I seek to give to that portion of the crop consumed—

No; I desire to read what Mr. Roosevelt said before that date. I did not know that he had said this; I overlooked it entirely. I will go back to July 30, 1932. This is Mr. Roosevelt talking. I read it to show the Senate what this thing means which we are called on to do here. Mr. Roosevelt said:

It is a difficult and highly technical matter to determine costs of production abroad and at home. A commission of experts can be trusted to find such facts. Then the facts should be left to speak for themselves, free from Presidential interference.

"Free from Presidential interference." Not only that he would not undertake to find them himself, but he said that to ascertain the difference in the cost in Europe compared with the cost in America is extremely difficult, and that he would not think of undertaking to find those costs himself. "They must be found", said Mr. Roosevelt, "by a fact-finding body free from Presidential interference."

Then, Mr. President, representatives of the Democratic Party come in here and dash those promises to the winds, as though the words were never uttered. We have the promises of the party in its platform, we have the promises of the President, promises made to the people, promises of the Democratic Membership of Congress, promises made that caused us to retire two Democratic Senators from the State of Louisiana for not going along with the party to uphold valid, constitutional, and legislative government, and after making those promises to the people and getting their votes they come here and say, "We are going to dash those promises to the demnition bowwows."

Mr. President, I understand several Senators have some matters they desire to present at this time, so I yield for the transaction of such business as they have to submit.

PURCHASE OF LAND AT RADIO STATION, GRAND ISLAND, NEBR.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce I report back favorably the bill (H.R. 9394) to authorize the Federal Radio Commission to purchase and enclose additional land at the radio station near Grand Island, Nebr., and I submit a report (No. 1058) thereon. The committee, having considered the bill, report it without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass. Accordingly I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator desires immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is a bill to authorize the Federal Radio Commission to purchase and enclose land at the radio station near Grand Island, Nebr.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator has a right to report the bill without any request. I shall object to its present consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. Am I to understand that the Senator from Nebraska merely desires to report the bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. No. I desire immediate consideration of the bill. It has passed the House. It is purely a local bill.

Mr. McNARY. Is it a House bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is a bill which originated in the House. It proposes to appropriate $1,200 for the purchase of some land at the Monitor station at Grand Island, Nebr. The bill has passed the House and has been considered by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and I have just reported it favorably. I am asking unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. There is no objection to the bill so far as I know.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that it is a House bill which has just been reported by the Senator from Nebraska and that he is asking unanimous consent for its present consideration. What is the condition that justifies its immediate consideration?

Mr. THOMPSON. In order that the work which is to be done on the additional land may be proceeded with.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will permit the passage of the bill.

Mr. LONG. It involves only $1,200, and is purely a local matter.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Radio Commission is authorized to purchase an additional tract of land containing approximately 10 acres adjacent to that now owned by the United States at Grand Island, Nebr., and to enclose the same for use in connection with the constant-frequency monitoring station located at said place. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $1,200 to carry out the purposes of this act.

LOAN OF TENTS, ETC., TO UNITED CONFEDERATE VETERANS

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment House bill 9092, and I submit a report (No. 1059) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. It is a bill merely authorizing the Secretary of War to lend certain tents to the Confederate Veterans' Reunion to be held at Chattanooga on June 6.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this is the usual bill which we pass for this purpose?

Mr. BACHMAN. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. It is in the usual form, I may say to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 9092) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend to the housing committee of the United Confederate Veterans 250 pyramidal tents, complete; fifteen 16- by 80-by 40-foot assembly tents; thirty 11- by 50- by 15-foot hospital-ward tents; 10,000 blankets, olive drab, no. 4; 5,000 canvas cots; 20 field ranges, no. 1; 10 field bake ovens, to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans, to be held at Chattanooga, Tenn., in June 1934, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to lend, at his discretion, to the housing committee of the United Confederate Veterans, whose encampment is to be held at Chattanooga, Tenn., June 6, 7, and 8, 1934, 250 pyramidal tents, complete with all poles, pegs, and other equipment necessary for their erection; fifteen 16- by 80- by 40-foot assembly tents, complete with all their poles, pegs, and equipment necessary for their erection; thirty 11- by 50- by 15-foot hospital-ward tents, complete with all their poles, pegs, and equipment necessary for their erection; 20 field ranges, no. 1, with necessary equipment for their erection; 10 field bake ovens with necessary equipment for their erection; 10,000 blankets, olive drab, no. 4; 5,000 canvas cots; 10 officers' tents complete with all their poles, pegs, and equipment necessary for their erection; 900 mess kits complete; 6 litters; 20 tent flys with poles for wall tents; and 30 garbage cans: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered from the nearest quartermaster depot at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the chairman of the said housing committee, Mr. Maurice C. Poss: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivery of such property, shall take from said Maurice C. Poss, chairman of the housing committee of the annual Confederate reunion, a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition and the whole without expense to the United States.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not desire to proceed further this evening. Nearly all Senators have left the Chamber, and it is after 5 o'clock. I suppose we are going to stop at about the usual time. I am not taking very much time in discussion of the bill. The few Senators who are here will agree with me that I have been speaking to the point.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Mississippi that I think the Senator from Louisiana will be satisfied to continue his remarks on Monday. I do not think he would consider Saturday as a desirable day for the conclusion of his remarks under the circumstances.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, am I to understand that the Senator from Louisiana has concluded his remarks?

Mr. LONG. No; I have not. However, I am not going to speak very much longer.

Mr. McNARY. I am satisfied the Senator from Louisiana can conclude in a short time Monday. We have worked hard all week. I will state frankly to the Senator from Mississippi that I believe if we shall adjourn until Monday, so that we may have an opportunity tomorrow to catch up with the work in our offices, we will expedite the consideration of the tariff measure.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that I have no desire in the world to cut off any Senator who desires to discuss the bill legitimately; and I do not believe there has been any illegitimate discussion of the bill or any unnecessary delay in its consideration. I can appreciate that there are certain Senators who, because of circumstances, perhaps, are not ready to proceed with the discussion of the bill at this time. Of course, the Senator from Oregon is aware of the fact that he was informed, and the Senate as a whole was informed, that we would take up this bill for discussion yesterday; and that date was fixed for the convenience of certain Senators.

I know that in the case of a bill of such magnitude and importance it is necessary that Senators shall express themselves. I desire to have the bill passed next week. I see no reason why it should not be passed next week. The Senator smiles, and makes me doubt my own statement. I may be wrong.

Mr. McNARY. I smiled because the Senator from Mississippi was speaking so eloquently.

Mr. HARRISON. I really thought the discussion of the bill might take 4 or 5 or 6 days, and it seems to me that that is ample time. While I do not wish to make an unreasonable request, I had hoped that at this time we might get an arrangement that beginning some day next week the debate might be limited. If the Senator desires to have Wednesday fixed as such date, or if he desires to have Thursday fixed, that will be all right; but I thought general debate might continue until that time, and then that there might be imposed a limitation of, say, 15 minutes upon amendments and 30 minutes upon the bill.

If such an arrangement may be made, we can be assured that by the end of next week—say, by Friday—we will reach a conclusion on the bill and get it out of the way.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I hope there will not be any unanimous-consent agreement made this evening with so many Senators absent. Perhaps we can reach a unanimous-consent agreement on the subject next week.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have conferred with the Senator from Mississippi, and I think it is quite impossible to enter into such an arrangement today. I should look with great favor upon such an arrangement if proposed during the first part of the coming week. A number of Members of the Senate are away who desire to discuss the bill. Before entering into an agreement, I should like to confer with them for the purpose of finding out the length of time they will require.

Aside from that, may we not recess or adjourn now until Monday?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me ask a question of the Senator, who is thoroughly familiar with what his side of the Chamber is going to do with reference to the discussion of this bill. Of course, we have heard various rumors. I have heard them contradicted. Does or does not the Senator think that we should be able to finish the consideration of this bill by the end of next week?

Mr. McNARY. I have not heard any rumors.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say quite frankly, for I have nothing to conceal, that I have understood that one of the Senators on the other side has 2,000 amendments which he is planning to offer to the bill. If there should be such an intention upon the part of any Senator to filibuster the bill, I may say quite frankly that I should try to hold the Senate in session tomorrow, and continue its consideration with a view of passing it.

Mr. McNARY. I will assure the Senator on my own responsibility that there is no Senator on this side who has 2,000 amendments to offer.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not believe the statement when I heard that there was such an intention, because I cannot imagine any Senator being so foolish as to plan to offer a great many amendments to the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I can also assure the Senator that there will be no filibuster. There will be an adequate presentation of the positions occupied by the Members of the Senate. If the Senator will move an adjournment now until Monday, we can resume the consideration of the bill at that time and go along in a businesslike way, and I am sure that some day soon we shall finish the discussion of the bill and have a vote upon it.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, it is the Senator's opinion that that is what will happen, and he will cooperate to the extent of trying to reach an early conclusion of the bill; not, of course, taking away from any Senator the right to discuss the bill legitimately.

Mr. McNARY. As soon as Senators on this side and others have an opportunity for a full presentation of the views they entertain, I shall cooperate to obtain an early vote. That is as far as I can go; and it constitutes no pledge other than that there will be a straightforward exposition and discussion of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not ask the Senator to give any pledge, but I had hoped we could get a unanimous-consent agreement of the kind I have indicated.

Mr. McNARY. We could not do that at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. I appreciate the fact that the Senator is cooperating in trying to bring the bill to a conclusion. Does not the Senator think that if we should meet tomorrow there are certain Senators on his side of the Chamber who would like to discuss the bill at that time, and thus reach an earlier conclusion upon it?

Mr. McNARY. No; I think it would be just a waste of time to meet tomorrow.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator really thinks we would get to a conclusion sooner by not holding a session tomorrow?

Mr. McNARY. I am sure of that; and it would give us a much-needed opportunity to catch up with our office work.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is aware of the fact that there was a tentative understanding that on Monday the electoral-college joint resolution would come up.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; that measure has been made a special order for Monday.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator contemplate that it will take much time?

Mr. McNARY. Let me say to the erudite Senator from Mississippi that his imagination is as good as mine.

Mr. HARRISON. My imagination was that not much time would be required. I did not think the discussion of the joint resolution would take over a couple of hours.

Mr. McNARY. Then I coincide with the Senator. I have not any idea on the subject; but I do think we ought to take a recess or adjourn until Monday.

RECESS

Mr. HARRISON. In view of the assurance and the fine spirit of cooperation manifested by the distinguished leader of the minority, joined in by the Senators who surround him—all of whom seem to approve his utterances—and in the hope that my action may expedite the disposition of the bill, I now move that the Senate take a recess until 10:45 o'clock on Sunday morning.

Mr. LONG. Sunday morning?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, Mr. President; we have a special order for Sunday morning.

Mr. LONG. I do not want my church hour disturbed; but that is all right. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until Sunday, May 20, 1934, at 10:45 o'clock a.m.

JOINT MEETING TO COMMEMORATE ONE-HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF DEATH OF LA FAYETTE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in conformity with House concurrent resolution 37, providing that the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 11 o'clock a.m. today to participate in exercises in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de La Fayette, I move that the Senate proceed in a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms, the Vice President, the Secretary, and the Chaplain, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

RECESS

At the conclusion of the exercises in the Hall of the House of Representatives, the Senate, under the order previously entered, stood in recess until Monday, May 21, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SUNDAY, MAY 20, 1934

The House met at 11 a.m., pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 37, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the Lord of lords and the King of kings, and our Father, too, whose life-giving currents course through the breasts of all men, we calmly wait at the altar of prayer. At Thy footstool we reverently acknowledge Thy sovereignty. We praise Thee that Thy merciful providence reaches to the ends of the earth. We pause today, as lovers of liberty, to breathe the deepest sentiment of gratitude. Heavenly Father, glorify Thyself in this service as the heart of the Nation is touched by the fidelity of soul and the loyal cooperation of a renowned son of another soil. He toiled valiantly to help seal the destiny of the New World. Thou who art "The Ancient of Days", richly bless the two great Republics, whose representatives are assembled in this service. May the ideals of free government, peace, and fraternity float on and on over the happy, prosperous union of these great peoples. Upon the breath of our prayer, we entreat Thee, O God, to let Thy light shine through all lands, inspiring good will and brotherhood the world over. Do Thou bless and enrich the Church universal and let the glory of the Lord be established in the souls of all nations; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mr. Leon Rothier sang La Marseillaise.

Mr. BLOOM, a Representative from the State of New York, presented His Excellency, Mr. André de Laboulaye, Ambassador of the French Republic.

ADDRESS OF THE AMBASSADOR OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC

His Excellency, Mr. André de Laboulaye, delivered the following address:

Mr. President, Mr. Vice President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Congress of the United States, it is indeed a great honor for the French Ambassador to be invited by the American Congress to address you within these walls in the presence of the President of the United States and to add his own country's tribute to that which the United States is today paying to General La Fayette. I owe this honor to the courtesy of the Congress which, in the past, has given so many proofs of its appreciation and gratitude for La Fayette's contribution toward American independence.

It was the Continental Congress which, in 1777, accepted the young Frenchman's assistance and conferred upon him the rank of major general in the Continental Army. Again, it was the Congress which, in 1824, gave an impressive reception to La Fayette on the occasion of his memorable visit to the United States. The attachment of the Congress and of the American people to La Fayette's memory through a century and a half is touching evidence both of the gratitude of the United States and of the greatness of the man to whom this honor is rendered.

To my own and my Government's appreciation of this tribute may I add the thanks of La Fayette's family, of which a member, Count René de Chambrun, is with us today.

Today's ceremony carries me back quite naturally to the celebration held in Paris 2 years ago, at the time of the bicentennial anniversary of Washington's Birthday, when the then President of the French Republic, Monsieur Paul Doumer, personally participated just as President Roosevelt is taking part today.

History has indeed united the names of Washington and La Fayette with bonds that cannot be severed. A friendship, so rare and so true, grew up between La Fayette—youthful and impetuous—and Washington—mature and self-possessed—and continued to bear fruit long after the deaths of these two great leaders. Despite occasional differences of opinion, their intercourse always was marked by a spirit of the greatest courtesy and confidence. This friendship between these two champions of liberty, based on complete devotion to the same ideals, must continue, as in the past, to inspire the American and French Nations, not only in the present but in the days to come.

I have been instructed by the President of the French Republic to convey to you the following message as an expression of the sentiments which are felt on this occasion by the Government and the people of France:

It affords me great pleasure to convey to the American people and to the Congress of the United States the grateful and fraternal greetings of the French people. Faithful for generations to the traditions of your forbears and to the unalterable feelings which constitute the treasured heritage of our two democracies, you are conforming to Washington's spirit in solemnly commemorating on this day the memory of La Fayette, citizen of France and citizen of the United States.

Your eminent President's moral authority, the initiative of Congress, and the spontaneous support of the whole American public invest this function with an impressive and moving solemnity. It is thus that you bear witness to your attachment to the traditions and principles of civilization of which the noble figure of La Fayette is a symbol. It is thus that you confirm the enduring value of the human contacts on which our mutual friendship is founded.

On the banks of the Moselle River, in the heart of the ancient city of Metz, the society of the Knights of Columbus has generously erected a monument in honor of La Fayette. When I attended its dedication at the side of Marshal Foch, and on numerous subsequent occasions, I have pondered over the episodes of the War of Independence and the World War, depicted by the bas-reliefs, and I have meditated upon the great lesson which these glorious feats teach the present generation.

The ideals of liberty which bound us together in those heroic days continue to inspire us in the task of building peace. Our two peoples are seeking progress and prosperity through orderly processes and through respect for the individual. Their common endeavor is the strongest safeguard for these ideals. Their mutual understanding continues to be one of the basic conditions for the maintenance of world peace.

In this spirit, the French people understand the full meaning and implication of the impressive homage rendered to La Fayette by the United States. I am expressing the sentiments of all my countrymen in assuring you of France's unchanging gratitude.

(Signed) ALBERT LEBRUN,
President of the French Republic.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] to present the President of the United States.

Mr. BYRD, a Senator from the State of Virginia, presented the President of the United States.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The President, Hon Franklin D. Roosevelt, delivered the following address:

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ambassador, Members of the Congress, Gentlemen of the Supreme Court, my friends: A century ago President Andrew Jackson, in communicating the melancholy news of the death of La Fayette to the Congress of the United States, called it "afflicting intelligence." And so it was. It made more than one Nation mourn, none more than our own. The Marquis de La Fayette was referred to in a General Order to our Army and Navy as "the distinguished friend of the United States"; and the Congress, with rare felicity, added to this the phrase, "the friend of Washington, and the friend of liberty."

In this threefold role of friendship we, the people of this Nation, have enshrined him in our hearts, and today we cherish his memory more than that of any citizen of a foreign country. It is as one of our Nation's peerless heroes that we hail him, just as his beloved France enshrined him in the Pantheon of her immortal sons.

Many generations later, more than two million American boys, backed by the solidarity of a great Nation, went to France. Those soldiers and sailors were repaying the debt of gratitude we owe to La Fayette, and at the same time they were seeking to preserve those fundamentals of liberty and democracy to which in a previous age he had dedicated his life.

There is no higher tribute we can pay to his memory than this we pay today. In communicating his death to the Nation, President Jackson ordered that "the same honors be rendered him as were observed upon the decease of Washington." Jackson was moved by the tenderness of a personal friendship—moved as he said, "by personal as by public considerations" to direct that every honor be paid "the last Major General of the Revolutionary Army."

We know the exquisite relationship which existed between Washington and La Fayette, and I am indeed pleased that the Ambassador of the French Republic has referred to this friendship. It was that of father and son. For the great Virginian the Frenchman had a veneration and love which approached homage. To him Washington was an ideal—almost more than human.

With Andrew Jackson, the friendship bore perhaps a more personal and intimate cast, because the two were more of an age. Both were mere youngsters at the outbreak of the Revolutionary War. Jackson, a boy of ten in 1777, first saw La Fayette when he landed in Charleston and before he started northward to meet the Congress. The sight of the gallant young Frenchman was so deeply engraved in the heart of Andrew Jackson that half a century later it was as vivid as the day it was etched. Jackson himself, even in boyhood, was to contribute his mite "to shake off the yoke of tyranny and to build up the fabric of free government." And when La Fayette visited our shores again in 1824, Jackson wrote him a paean of welcome, in which he referred to the state of his "own youthful feelings" on the occasion of that first visit. His coming then, he said—

> Aroused every patriot from a state of despair to that of confidence in our bleeding cause, while the shout of victory or death was sung through the welkin. It inspired an enthusiasm becoming the people who had resolved to be free.

When they met here in Washington, La Fayette said this to the hero of New Orleans:

> Had you witnessed my anxiety, when on a sudden all Europe was pacified, and the flower of the British Army were on their way to Louisiana, you would still better judge what I felt of relief, joy, and pride on receiving the glorious account of your victory. I have long anticipated the pleasure to take you by the hand, and whatever be your future movements I will not leave the United States before I have seeked and found opportunity to express in person my high regard and sincere friendship.

This first meeting was as simple and genuine as their natures. Jackson had come to Washington for the session of the Congress, as Senator from Tennessee. He put up with his old friend, John Gadsby, at the Franklin House; and immediately learned that La Fayette was a guest in the same inn. The mayor of Washington had informed the President of the United States that—

> The friend of the people (La Fayette) must be the guest of the people, and could not stay at the White House.

It was a memorable Congress that year, the last to elect a President of the United States, and Andrew Jackson was in the thick of the storm. The two old soldiers saw much of each other during that long winter, and as a Member of the Senate Jackson took part in all the ceremonies held in honor of the French patriot.

It stands on the record of the day that—

> La Fayette was the only man who ever was, in his personal capacity, publicly received by the Senate of the United States.

The record shows that they received him—> as a brother, rather than a stranger, as one of a loving family, come from a distant shore, after a long and weary absence, to revisit the friends of his youth.

Senator Barbour, of Virginia, presented him. The President and the Senators rose from their seats, uncovered, and the General, advancing toward the Chair of the Senate, was invited to take a seat prepared for him on the right of the Chair. The Senate then was adjourned; for a while the Senators flocked about their guest and gave him a warm-hearted welcome.

It was given to the House of Representatives to extend the welcome of the Nation. Exactly such an assembly as this now before me met in the Hall of Representatives, every branch of the Government fully in attendance. Henry Clay, the Speaker, in expressing what was in the hearts of the people, said:

> The vain wish has sometimes been indulged that Providence would allow the patriot, after death, to return to his country, and to contemplate the immediate changes which had taken place.

To La Fayette had come, he said:

> The realization of the consoling object of that wish.
> General, you are in the midst of posterity.
> No, Mr. Speaker,—

Replied La Fayette,

> posterity has not begun for me—since, in the sons of my companions and friends, I find the same public feelings in my behalf which I have had the happiness to experience in their fathers.

I like to remember also the picture of the visit of General La Fayette to General Jackson at the Hermitage. When La Fayette landed at Nashville, the people stood far back and let Jackson go forward alone to greet him and to welcome him as his feet touched the shore.

At the official welcome of the State of Tennessee, a group of Revolutionary soldiers, some thirty or forty officers and men, stepped forward to greet the old patriot. He saluted each of them with animation and affection. Suddenly his eye fell on one whom he had known in France, who had come with him to America and had been at his side during the Revolution. This worn and wearied old soldier had ridden 1700 miles to see his old general; and when they met, they fell into each other's arms, kissed each other as only Frenchmen can perform that act of devotion, and sobbed aloud.

The next day Jackson entertained him at the Hermitage. The people seemed to sense that history was being made and left them much to themselves. They talked about the French and American Revolutions, and much about Napoleon. Jackson took pride in showing him over the house he had built for his beloved wife. He produced a box of pistols, and opening it, asked La Fayette if he knew whose pistols they were. "Yes," said La Fayette, "they are the ones I gave to General Washington in 1778, and," he added, "I feel a real satisfaction in finding them in the hands of a man so worthy of such a heritage."

Today I have brought to show to the Congress of the United States another link between La Fayette and our country—a sword which has never yet been shown to the American people.

After the termination of the World War and the reoccupation of Alsace by the French, this sword was rediscovered. Its history is this: Shortly before the death of Washington his old companions in arms—those gallant Frenchmen who had taken part in our War of the Revolution—joined together and had this sword made by special order to be presented to their former Commander in Chief.

Before the presentation could be made, Washington died; and 133 years later, through the fine courtesy and feeling of the present Government of France, the sword was brought to America by a distinguished descendant of General La Fayette and presented to the present President of the United States. This sword rests and will rest for all time below the portrait of President Washington in the White House.

I like to associate La Fayette and Jackson. La Fayette's last letter to Jackson was an appeal for help from the Congress for the family of a brave Frenchman who had served in our Revolutionary War. His last thoughts were of Congress and of Jackson. He instructed his son to send to Jackson, for transmittal to the Congress—

A copper plate on which was inscribed the first engraved copy of the American Declaration of Independence to be deposited in their Library as a last tribute of respect, patriotic love, and affection for his adopted country.

It is a singular coincidence that Jackson's mind many years later turned to La Fayette in his last hours. When Jackson's will, signed with his palsied hand, was opened, it was found that he had bequeathed to George Washington La Fayette—

The pistols of General La Fayette which were presented by him to Gen. George Washington, and by Col. William Robertson presented to me.

These he desired sent to the son of his old friend, as his will declared—

As a memento of the illustrious personages through whose hands they have passed, his father, and the Father of His Country.

Mr. Ambassador, I trust that you will inform our good friend, the President of the French Republic, the Government of France, and through them the people of France that on this hundredth anniversary of the death of Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de La Fayette, we, the representatives of the people of the United States, have assembled once more to do honor to the friend of America.

Mr. Lawrence Tibbett sang Kipling's Recessional and the Star-Spangled Banner.

BENEDICTION

Rev. ZeBarney Thorne Phillips, D.D., L.L.D., Chaplain of the Senate, pronounced the benediction, as follows:

May the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your hearts and minds in the knowledge and love of God and of His Son, Jesus Christ, and may the blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit be upon the people of this country and our sister Republic and upon the peoples of the whole earth and remain with them from this time forth, henceforth, even forever more. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint session of the two Houses is now dissolved.

Thereupon the President and his Cabinet, the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, the Diplomatic Corps, the General of the Armies, the Chief of Staff of the United States Army, the Chief of Naval Operations of the Navy, the Major General Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard, the Governors of the several States, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, Count René de Chambrun, representatives of the Revolutionary patriotic societies, the Vice President and the Senate retired.

AFTER RECESS

The House was called to order by the Speaker at 12:03 o'clock p.m.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings of today be printed in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted at the proper place in the Record of today's proceedings cablegrams received from the President of the Senate of France, and other distinguished officials of the Government of France.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The cablegrams referred to are as follows:

PARIS, May 18, 1934.

PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C.

At the moment when in a like sentiment of recognition our two Republics are celebrating the memory of La Fayette, the hero of liberty, I beg you to transmit to the Congress of the United States the cordial greeting of the French Senate. We will never forget that yesterday as formerly our two nations were united in defending an ideal of right and justice.

JULES JEANNENEY,
President of the Senate.

PARIS, May 19, 1934.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS,
Washington, D.C.

I wish to associate myself as the Minister of Foreign Affairs with the sentiments expressed in the Congress by the President of the French Republic on the occasion of this ceremony which consecrates and glorifies the time-honored friendship of our two countries.

LOUIS BARTHOU.

PARIS, May 18, 1934.

PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

The Committee of Foreign Affairs of the French Chamber wishes to associate itself with the pious ceremony organized by the Congress in honor of La Fayette, the hero of liberty in the two worlds and the symbol of the understructible fraternity which unites our two nations. We are grateful and proud of the homage rendered to the memory of our illustrious compatriot who was, with George Washington, one of the founders of the modern political civilization.

PAUL BASTID,
Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, May 18, 1934.

PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

As Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and also as former Ambassador of France to the United States of America, I wish to associate myself solemnly in the celebration by the American Congress of the one hundredth Anniversary of the death of La Fayette. No celebration could be dearer to the hearts of the French Senators. They are deeply grateful to their American colleagues and salute the ever-living symbol of an indestructible spiritual friendship between the heirs of the American Revolution and the descendants of the French Revolution for the progressive development of individual liberties and collective civilization.

HENRY BERENGER.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 4 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Monday, May 21, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.
